VICTORIAN PASCHAL TABLE.

Easter, Rules to find by Tables.

The Easter is in the square where a line from the Dominical Letter (found by Table C) meets a line from the Golden No. (found by Table U). The Easter dates are March 22—April 24; lunar days, 16—22.

Differences between Victorian and Alexandrine Easters explained.

These were all marked in the Cycle. On the two first, the Prologue is silent; but from II. B it states¹ that only two Easters are possible: March 20 (new moon, March 5), according to the Latins; never celebrated (owing to falling before the Equinox), although canonical in lunar computation; April 24, according to the Egyptians: which was sometimes observed (an allusion to the Easter of 455, which gave occasion to the compilation of the Victorian Cycle).

Easter day,

With regard to the remaining differences, the Prologue professes² to give them for the information of

Having quoted this, Bede proceeds to confute his "saintly brother, Victorius" in a series of questions and supposed answers, and, to obviate the charge, on the part of the admirers of Victorius, that he rashly attacked him, concludes the chapter with two extracts from a book of Victor, bishop of Capua, relative to the Victorian Easter of 550 (De temp. rat. li.).

the Pontiff, to whom it appertains to select the day. Other Easters (which are immaterial to the present purpose), it adds¹, are placed on the margin, not as having authority, but as indicating variety of opinion.

It remains to be observed, in connexion with the origin of the Mundane Reckonings given in these Annals, that a pseudo-Victorian Mundane Period of 5200 (i.e., A.M. 5201 = A.D. 1), based on interpolated² passages of the Prologue, is employed in the Irish work De mirabilibus Sacrae Scripturae. From that source it was taken by Tigernach.

Finally, the Table of Paschal Months shows the agreement and difference between the Golden Numbers of the Paschal systems described³.

In A, the perplexing contiguity of II. and III. explains how the latter came to be superseded by one or other of the IV. columns. As regards V., the Syro-Macedonian months corresponded, day for day, Dystrus with March; Xanthicus with April.

In B, the Epact is the moon's age (not on the day opposite which it stands, but) on March 1 of each luni-solar year (represented by a Golden No.). In the Lunar Letters, the one-day interval between E and F in April makes the ten letters represent the 29 days of the hollow month. The rule of alternate full and hollow lunations is apparently violated in II. of 84 and XXIII. of 84 (12). But the moon 30 in question on March 1 is what the Greeks called old and new,⁴ and Western computists, thirtieth and first.⁵

ad meum pertinebat officium praeterire, et in eius constitueretur arbitrio qui universali ecclesiae praesideret quatenus potissimum dies in tali conditione solemnitati precipuae deputetur (loc. cit.).

¹ Adds.—Caeteris, quae a latere similiter adiecta sunt, non firmatur auctoritas; sed varia significatur opinio (loc. cit.).

² Interpolated.—See Todd Lecture Series, III. 365 sq.

³ Described.—For the Pseudo-Anatolian, see in the Irish Paschal controversy, Table X., p. cxxvi., infra.

⁴ Old and new.—Ενη, or Ένη, και νέα. The authorities are given in Stephanus' Thesaurus, s. v. Ένεα (Lond. ed., 1821-2, III, 3735 7).

⁵ Thirtieth and first.—Nam, completo cursu tricenalis, uno mense tricenisima canitur et aliomense tricenisima quae et prima (De Cursu lun[a]e, Cologne MS. 83^u, fol. 56, Krusch, Der 8. jährl. Ostercyclus, p. 242).

It is derived from the Rule for finding the moon's age: $(89 + 30 =) 119 \div 59$ leaves 1; showing the moon is hollow. The reckoning appears distorted in the spurious Tractate of St. Athanasius hereinafter described, and therefrom in the fabricated Anatolius, which has the ninth Easter on April 14th, moon 15 (not 14).

III.
Mundane
Reckon-
ings :
Tigernach.

III.—The Mundane Reckonings used in the Annals had their origin in a Fragment¹ of Tigernach,—three vellum folios, of the thirteenth or fourteenth century, bound up with the MS. A, and containing 490 years (A.D. 81—570), for almost three-fourths blank, with intermittent ferial and Alexandrine epactal notation. Of the chronological data, the following directly relate to the present subject.

(1)
Mundane

(b) Bedan

(1).² Wednesday, moon 2 [27], [A.M.] Septuagint, 5290 [5295], Hebrew, 4046, A.D. 95. The rectification of the Septuagint number is supplied by the Annals of Ulster, in which 5201 is the difference between the Septuagint A.M. and the Hebrew A.D. This is the pseudo-Victorian Mundane Period, 5200, of the Irish Augustine. The difference between 4046 and 95, 3951, is the Mundane Period of Bede. But, on the other hand, although A.D. 95 is intended, the week-day of Jan. 1 and the genuine Victorian A.M. denote A.D. 94. Finally, whilst the cyclic computation of the Fragment proves that A.D. 95 is meant, the epact is of 89. (This prolepsis of 5 years continues throughout.)

(2).³ Thursday, moon 9 [4], [Sep., 5453] Heb. 4204.

¹ Fragment.—See Todd Lecture Series, III. 354 sq. Reference in the following notes is by fol. (1, 2, 3), page (a, b), and col. (1, etc.; 6 to the page). Of the five missing years supplied in the T. L. S. III., the fourth is;—iii. clxvii. Kl. En. i. f., l. xx. The Editor, who imprudently relied upon O'Curry's transcript, found afterwards that the original has the entry, which is identical with the restoration (fol. 1 b, 3).

² 1.—iiii. xlv. Kl. En. iii. f., l. ii. Ab initio mundi vccxc., secundum lxx. Interpretes; secundum Ebreos, iii. xlv. Ab Incarnatione xcv (fol. 1a, 2).

³ 2.—iiii. cc. iii. Kl. En. v. f., l. ix. Hic est annus primus noni celi magni paschalis, qui habet iii. Concurrentes bissextiles et tertius

This is the first year of the 9th great Paschal cycle, and it has 4 bissextile Concurrents and is the 3rd year of Indiction. The Concurrents are of B.C. 1 and A.D. 252; the (proleptic) Indiction of 252 is 15; the epact is of 247. Such is the genesis of Tigernach's pseudo-Bedan A.M.: founded apparently on the fact that years which are 9 solar cycles apart have the same ferial incidence, and differ only by 5 in the lunar. How a grave annalist could base an Era on the laughable paradox that A.D. 1 began on A.D. 252, remains to be explained by those who applaud Tigernach as the most reliable¹ of the equated with A.D. 252, A.M. 4256, (i.e., eight great Paschal native chroniclers. Nor is this all. A.M. 4204 being cycles) corresponds with A.D. 303, which gives a Paschal Mundane Period of 4255. Admirers of Tigernach will find it somewhat difficult to suggest a plausible explanation of this notable discovery.

(3)² Saturday, moon 20 [15], [5454] 4205. This is the year of the Incarnation of Christ, according to Dionysius: for, according to him, He was born in the 2nd year of the great Paschal cycle. And it has 5 Concurrents. The solar criteria denote A.D. 1 and A.D. 253; the epact is of A.D. 248.

(4)³ Sunday, moon 7 [2], [5461] 4212. This is the year of the Incarnation, according to Bede, and it has 7 bissextile Concurrents. A.D. 8 and 260, in solar; A.D. 255, in lunar, reckoning.

est annus Indictionis (fol. 2a, 2, 3.)

¹ Reliable. — "Tigernach, the most trustworthy and illused of Irish chroniclers" (Tripartite, Rolls' ed., Introd. p. cxxvii.). "He is," a note (ib.) has it, "so far as I know, the only Irish . . . chronicler honest enough to confess that some of his materials were uncertain. 'Omnia monumenta Scotorum usque Cimbaeth incerta erant.' There is a similar passage in Irish in the Book of Ballymote."

Tigernach's honesty, however, did not extend to the confession that he merely put the Irish passage in question into Latin. For the proof that this was his original and for the reliability of Tigernach, see T. L. S. III. 251-2; 361.

² 3.—IIIciv. Kl. En. vii. f., l. xx. Hic est annus Incarnationis Christi secundum Dionisium, quia, secundum eum, secundo anno celi magni paschalis natus est. Qui annus habet v. Thereafter, in six¹ places, the so-called Dionysian A.D. is given after the Hebrew. The fourth² entry is: [Sep. 5620, Heb.] 4371; A.D., Hebrew, 420, Dionysian, 167. Accordingly, the first reckoning in the Annals of Ulster ought to be: 5632, 4383, 432, 179; that is to say, 12 were to be added to each number of the Tigernach series. But, instead, A.D. 432, the true year, is named Dionysian³, and 253 (i.e., A.D. 252 + B.C. 1) are added to each of the other three sums, making: A.M., Septuagint, 5885, Hebrew, 4636; A.D., Hebrew, 685, Dionysian, 432. (A Bedan A.D., which is added, should be 425, according to Tigernach.) In this way, the whole of the notation, as shown in the Index, is carried out. The arbitrary variation is of a piece with the two chronistic inventions of Tigernach. The reckoning, however, serves one good purpose relative to the rectification of the Ulster chronology.

IV.—That A.D. dating was known in Ireland towards the middle of the seventh century, appears from the mention of the Dionysian Cycle in the Paschal Epistle of Cumman. For non-Paschal purposes, however, it was held in no better estimation by the Irish than by Dionysius, as shown by the fact that no instance of its annalistic use occurs for nearly two centuries later, and even then it alternates with decemnovennial notation. On folio 15a of the Irish Carlsruhe Codex of Bede (one of the sources of the Grammatica Celtica), containing the Alexandrine cycles from 532 to 1063, a Latin entry⁴ is written on the margin.

Death of Murchad, son of Maelduin [king of Kinelowen], in Clonmacnoise, from [—on] the bed of [St.] Ciaran, in the tenth year. 826, cyclic date.

Tenth, of course, presupposes a first identified year. The two obits have consequently to be taken together. The 817 of the first was an initial decemnovennial year, and tenth year was an allusive way of designating 826. To show how misleading the indication is, it has been conjectured² that, as Murchad was deposed in 820, tenth meant 831. To which (not to mention that 820 would assign the death to 829, and that the present Annals state Murchad was set aside in 823) the fatal objection is that the deposition is not to be found in Codex.

The earliest recorded occurrence of its independent employment is found in the Liber de mensura orbis terrae, which the author, Dicuil, states was finished A.D. 825.

Post³ octingentos viginti quinque peractos Summi annos Domini . . . 825, A.D.

But the older system was not yet superseded. In the Leyden Irish Codex of Priscian, a certain Dubthach minutely specified the day whereon he wrote⁴ a hexameter and pentameter by the following Paschal data: 3rd of the Ides [11th] of April; 3rd year of decemnovennial cycle; 3rd day before Easter [which thus fell on April 14]. So precise, and yet so vague! Having regard to the probable date of the MS., the criteria denote either A.D. 753, 838, cyclic date.

Ussher, The futility of the A.D. method to determine the true years of itself cannot be more clearly demonstrated than by the present Annals. From 431 to 1014, every year is duly numbered, yet it is a commonplace that this part is antedated by one year. The prolepsis was discovered by Ussher, who, as we have seen, frequently quotes the Annals and thus explains² it at the first year cited: "858 from Christ's Nativity (or 859 from his Incarnation, after the computation of the Church of England)." Again: "So in the same Annals [of Ulster], at the year of our Lord, 920 (or 921 after the common account)."

O'Connor, With the intuition which found out that Tigernach knew the Dominical Letters, O'Connor³ made the "remarkable" discovery that these Annals "are uniform in antedating the Christian area by one year only down to 1263"! "The reader is to bear in mind," O'Donovan⁴ writes, "that the Annals of Ulster are antedated by one year up to 1014."

Reeves, Dealing with the year of St. Columba's death (which he erroneously concluded to be 597, instead, as has been shown, of 596), Reeves⁵ says of the Saint's obit in the Annals of Ulster. "Their signature is vii., which gives

B as the Sunday-letter and indicates 595, the very year in their margin, for where they say 594, they mean 595." And, at foot, he assigns no explanation of the discrepancy, except that "this curious perversity prevails all through these Annals till 1015 [1014], where they right themselves." Apparently copying Ussher, Todd¹ states that the Annals "date from the era of the Incarnation, not from the Nativity, so that their years are all one less than the A.D., or the era of the Birth of our Lord."

Passing over the fact that, as we have seen², the Chronography of 354 makes the year of the Nativity A.D. 1, not B.C. 1, Ussher's solution is negated by the ferial and lunar criteria, which prove that the opening years are accurate. The Annals themselves supply the means of rectification in the (a) ferial, and (b) lunar notation, and (c) Mundane Reckonings. erroneous of error :

numbering blank
as 487.

As the solar and lunar criteria from 486, inclusive, prove that the A.D. intended is a year later, the error arose between 481 and the textual 486. Since the textual 486 is the true A.D. 487, the original 486, it follows, was blank, with the result that, as in the Annals of Innisfallen and the Tigernach Fragment, the signature, Kal., or Kl., was omitted, whether from ignorance or oversight, in transcription. Next came the

A.D. numerator, who, knowing nothing of the ferial and epact, merely counted the existing Kal., and placed 486, the number of the missing year, after the Kal. of 487, and continued the error to 1013. In consequence, the chronology to 485, inclusive, is correct; 486 is wanting; thenceforward, to 1013, the dates are one year in advance.

The misdating in B from 1191 to 1196, it has been shown in the Notes, arose from ignorance of chronistic criteria on the part of the summarist. The same is to be said, as regards A, of the more serious error, continued through more than a century (1265-1378) and accumulating by accretions of from two to five years. The latter arose from the notarial pedantry of beginning the year later than January, thereby including portions of two Julian years in one A.D. But, as the ferial and epact were always changed on Jan. 1, this should not have misled any fairly informed annalist or copyist. In the present case, the text preserved these data to an extent quite sufficient to have obviated the deviation in question.

Later, misdating in B, source of ; in A,

The aid afforded by the rectified Annals towards correcting work that passes for accurate may be appositely illustrated by some of the historical references in the Tripartite Life of St. Patrick, as verified in the Introduction to the Rolls' edition.

Corrective value of Annals,

Ciaran (monk) of Castlekieran, Meath, is stated¹ to have died A.D. 770. This is the year in the Four Masters, which O'Donovan allowed to pass uncorrected. But to show how reliable they are, at their 768 they transcribe the items given in the Annals of Ulster at 773, with the notable exception of the lunar eclipse of Dec. 2! V. V.—In its marginal and interlinear spaces, the Paschal Table invited such laconic items as the obits, battles, initial regnal years, eclipses, etc., given in the nucleus of chronicle beginning of the present Annals. In process of time, as additions came to be made from other native cycles and foreign sources, more room would be required, rendering an independent volume necessary. Such was the origin of the Books referred to or cited in several places. The years being sufficiently identified in the series by the respective ferial and epact, to retain purely Paschal data would be superfluous for merely historical purposes. The exceptional character of the Lenten and Easter dates of 919, 1014 and 1109 accounts for their insertion.

The unforeseen uncertainty wrought by this omission was rendered well nigh irreparable by the proleptic substitution of the new epacts for the old, when the Paschal system was changed. Three typical instances occur in these Annals. In 618, a battle was fought on Easter Sunday; in 636, Carthach fled from Rahen (to Lismore), at Easter-tide; in 674, a rain-bow shaped cloud appeared Good Friday night. So well known, or so easy to be discovered, were the Paschal dates, that doubtless it seemed time and parchment wasted to record them. A change of system and therewith the loss of the clue seem not to have occurred to those who made the entries. At length, we are in a position to supply them. In 618, Easter was April 16, according to the 84, Victorian and Alexandrine Cycles; in 636, the Irish Easter fell on April 21 (V. and A., March 30); in 674, on March 26 (V. and A., April 12).

Easters of 84 omitted

On the other hand, to take but a few instances, with respect to the obit of Egbert on Easter, 728; the burning of Clonard on Easter eve, 789; frost and snow from Jan. 6 to Easter, 1008; and the massacre of O'Boylan, with 38 others, on the Eve of Low Sunday, 1119, no ambiguity can arise from the omission of the Calendar Paschal days. The respective Alexandrine incidence was April 24, April 18 (Easter, April 19), March 28, and April 5 (Easter, March 30).

Alexandrine Easters omitted.

To this last composite recension belong all the extant native chronicles, including the Annals of Ulster. Of these, the most ancient are the Annals of Innisfallen, the early portion whereof is based in part on the Victorian Cycle, and which do for Munster what the present compilation does for Ulster.

That the Paschal Cycle formed the foundation, appears furthermore from the interspersed Latin versions. These were manifestly made to accord with the language of the Easter Table, and may reasonably be regarded as tolerably contemporaneous with the events. Who, at a later period, say the close of the tenth century, would have been at pains to turn some items into Latin, leaving the remainder in Irish; and, more important still, unlike the run of after-time workers, possessed the discrimination here shown in the use of obsolete and current terms? Three entries, for example, are given of brawls that took place in Armagh, on Whitsunday, in 781, 819, and 893, respectively. Is it probable that a latinist, at the time indicated, selected the first, to the capricious exclusion of the second and third, for translation? The improbability is appreciably increased by the loan-word for Whitsunday, a vocable so rare as to be found in only two other documents connected with Ireland, the (interpolated) Penitential¹ of Columbanus and the Canon of the Mass in the Stowe Missal²: in the latter of which, moreover, the rubric, instead of the textual Quinquagesima, has Pentecost proving how, as early as the middle of the eighth century, the Latin equivalent was becoming otherwise antiquated. Again, princeps, abbas, abb and coarb are employed indifferently down to 948, where the first occurs for the last time. The want of uniformity and the disappearance of the most idiomatic of the terms are quite incompatible with a subsequent comprehensive Latin version.

versions,

The Latin renderings, it may be asserted with some confidence, were the work of the monastic Lectors and of literati, such as Dubthach, who, perhaps on that account, were distinguished by the title of Latinists.

But the clearest evidence that the records were coeval with the events is supplied by the solar and luni-solar entries digested under Criteria and Eclipses in the Index. These memoranda were manifestly made soon after the facts occurred and, what redounds to the credit of the Annals, regardless of the variance thereby revealed with Paschal reckoning.

A.D. 592, for instance, a solar eclipse is said to have occurred in the morning. This (the only one of that year) took place on March 19¹, at 9 a.m. The true epact was consequently 13. According to the 84, it was 15; new moon on March 17 (not 19). Again, in 664, a solar eclipse is recorded, May 1,² about 3 p.m. The true epact was 29. In the 84, it was 2; new moon on March 30. In the *Ecclesiastical History*³ and the Chronicle, Bede has May 3, about 4 p.m. The explanation given by Ussher⁴ is that, having heard the eclipse happened in the beginning of May and knowing it could occur only at new moon, Bede concluded the day was the 3rd, which has XIX., the Alexandrine Golden Number of 664, in the Calendar. Be that as it may, the contrast is distinctly favourable to the native Annalists.

It will not be out of place to note that the year of Golden No. XIX., mentioned in the same chapter as having, according to ocular testimony, new moon on April 2, two days before the Calendar date, was 702. A lunar eclipse took place April 16, at 10.30 p.m. (L'Art, etc. 314.) The Alexandrine Easter (Ap. 23) was consequently held on the 22nd of the moon! The Irish (Ap. 16) was astronomically correct.

A statement of such minute and accurate detail proceeded from no other than an eye-witness. If additional proof is required, we have MS. B, which gives the 4th², instead of the 14th, of the moon! The luni-solar dates are derived from the Alexandrine epact, 23; the true epact was 25.

Native
entries, antiquity of.

The antiquity of the entries in Irish is well attested by the Old-Irish declensional and conjugational forms, and, far more conclusively, by the words and constructions, the meaning of which is still, and seems destined to continue, purely conjectural. One thing is abundantly established thereby,—the early native Christian chroniclers had wide command of the prose and metric of the mother tongue.

For the rest, it needs but a cursory examination to reveal the fact that the Annals were a compilation. Transcripts, namely, were obtained³ of the records of various establishments. From these the items of each year were somewhat crudely and not always correctly digested. At 792, for example, Maelruain of Tallaght, Aedhan of Rahen, and another Aedhan, bishops and soldiers of Christ, are said to have slept in peace. But, in the first place, Maelruain was demonstrably not a bishop. To cite but one proof, of the twelve named in the Book of Leinster⁴ as his folk of unity (i.e., who lived under him), the eleventh is Eochaid, bishop of Tallaght. This was the Echaidh, bishop, anchorite and abbot (next to add that the items are passed over by the Four Masters.

but one in succession to Maelruain, founder) of Tallaght, whose obit is given at 812. The absence of the designation in the list of names, taken with the notice of Echaidh, shows that Maelruain was (not a bishop-, but) a presbyter-abbot, having in his monastery Echaidh for episcopal function.

Secondly, in the Annals of the Four Masters, which have the three obits¹ distinct, bishop and soldier of Christ are confined to the second Aedhan. Add that the name of the Aedhan of Rahen is in the genitive in the Annals of Ulster, and we shall have discovered the source of the error. In reducing Quies Maelruain, Quies Aedhain and Dormitatio Aedhain, episcopi et militis Christi, to one sentence, the summarist made the eulogistic terms plural and applied them to all three!

With reference to other native sources, the available information is given at the years indicated under Books in the Index. The foreign, Bede, Isidore and Marcellinus, were probably cited at first hand. To these is to be added the Liber Pontificalis, or Lives of the Popes, commonly, but erroneously, attributed to Anastasius the Librarian. The extent to which it has been drawn upon will be found at Popes, in the Index. The serious annalistic errors, there can be little doubt, arose from inability to equate the respective consular signatures of the original with the solar and luni-solar data of the native Chronicle. The additional variants (tabulated in Appendix C) in the regnal months and days furnish fresh and striking illustration of the inherent liability of alphabetical numeration to corrupt transcription.

The initial item of the Annals, that Palladius was sent to Ireland by Pope Celestine, is the well known statement in the Chronicle of Prosper; but that it was taken from the source is incompatible with the mention of the Consuls, Aetius and Valerius, instead of Bassus and Antiochus of the original. As, furthermore,

Among the Cycles named by Cummian, in his Paschal Epistle, premier place¹ is assigned to that which Patrick brought and composed. The first assertion (the second is plainly an inference) may be taken as giving the accepted tradition respecting the Patrician Cycle, or Table. Direct evidence is, however, superfluous. At the time and long previously, it was the rule² for the Pope to announce at midsummer to the Western churches the date of the coming Easter; whilst by a Conciliar Decree³, enacted

The Milevi enactment was an extension of the 12th of the Council of Carthage of A.D. 407, whereof the part in question is: Placuit, ut quicumque ad comitatum ire voluerit, in Formata, qua ad urbis Romae ecclesiam mittitur, intineatur: ut inde etiam ad comitatum Formatam accipiat. Quod si accipiens ad Romam tantummodo Formatam, et tacens necessitatem, quae [qua] ad comitatum illi pergendum est, voluerit etiam ad comitatum pergere, a communione removeatur. Quod si ibi, Romae, sixteen years before, the commendatory letters furnished to clerics journeying were to specify the next Easter day, or, if such was still uncertain (namely, not notified as above), the recorded date of the feast last past.¹ How much more essential, that a bishop, proceeding to evangelize an island between which and the continent annual communication would necessarily be precarious, should be provided with a prospective Paschal Table, whether of 84, or 100, years?

Accordingly, when Fiac, in turn, was consecrated bishop and sent to convert his native Leinster by Patrick, along with the bell and service-set (chalice and paten) and crozier, the *case*² presented to him by the consecrator contained a tablet. This polaire was the native

According to the Hesperica Famina (an Old-Irish skit on the native affectation of Greek), the tabula was waxed and quadrangular (P. L. XC. 1195-6). Cf. the Dacian triptych (a Cautio de puero empto), which is 4½ by 4½ inches, and has 14 lines of writing on the third page (C. I. L. III. Dacica Instrumenta, No. VII., p. 942).

By a natural error, in cereis (i.e. the Paschal taper) of de temporat. xlvii. is glossed in tablets (hi claraib) in the Carlsruhe Codex of Bede (Gloss. Hib. 249). The years described by St. Columba on a casket cover were perhaps incised in the wood. In huius [pineae] capsae operculo numerum xxiii. annorum describo (Vita Col. ii. 5).

In the corresponding place of the Tripartite Life (MS. Rawlinson B, fol. 22d), the plural (polairi) is found. This arose from confounding the Paschal Table with the tablets mentioned in a passage in the Book of Armagh (fol. 9a), which states that, on one occasion, seeing Patrick's eight or nine companions, with tablets in their hands written in the Mosaical style (on both sides, Exod. xxxii. 15), the pagans called out to have them slain, saying they had swords in their hands to slay people, which seemed of wood, but in their opinion were of iron, for shedding blood.

These tablets were doubtless similar to the diptychs, of which a specimen figured in Gori's Thesaurus Diptychorum is 15½ inches long, by 5½ wide, with writing space of 14 inches by 4½, containing 28 lines of (Greek) script (Florence, 1759, vol. I., p. 263, Tab. X. I. b. cf. Donati, De Dittici, etc. p. 136). The handle suggested in the text would be some 3 inches long (that of an ancient crepitaculum ecclesiasticum in Gori, III. Tab. X., is 3½). The resemblance to the short broad swords of the Irish would thus readily present itself.

equivalent of pugillare, in the sense of Paschal Table, which the original, pinax, bore in the title (engraved, as quoted¹, on the chair) of one of the Hippolytan works; in the Easter Treatise² of Cyprian; and, more appositely still, in the Irish spurious Athanasian Paschal Tractate³. If it be asked why the Greek was not directly drawn from, the reason is to be found in the risk of confusion⁴ with derivatives from the Latin pinna (point, summit) and penna (pen). Moreover, the pedantic use of Greek words was confined to the Latin compositions of Irish writers: knowledge of the language was naturally too restricted to allow Hellenic vocables or loan-words to be introduced into the native vernacular. Inclusion with articles not necessarily of daily employment distinguishes this tablet from the tablets which, the falling of his graph (graphium), or stylus⁵, from Patrick's mantle shows, were carried on the person, in readiness for immediate use,—to receive, for instance, the *alphabets*⁶, or elements (of Christian doctrine), which the Apostle, we learn from the Tripartite Life and the Book of Armagh, wrote for distinguished converts.

year of the coming of Palladius as A.P. 401, A.M. 5632; the year of the Patrician arrival as A.P. 402, A.M. 5633. Consuls, Aetius and Valerius. (The A.M. shows that the A.P. years should be 404, 405, respectively. The errors were scribal.) With the Victorian Cycle under his hand (Consular Fasti were unknown to the Irish), why did the synchronist not name the Consuls of the Palladian, as well as of the Patrician, year? Manifestly, because his object was (not to supply Bassus and Antiochus, but) to identify two years (one designated by consulship) by the Victorian A.P. and A.M. Now, the only document containing the Consuls Aetius and Valerius and connected with Patrick known in Ireland when this Tract was composed¹, towards the close of the sixth century, was the Patrician Paschal Table. It began, accordingly, with the year in which they were Consuls. Whence the Ballymote chronologer drew the right, indeed the inevitable, conclusion that Patrick arrived in Ireland in the initial year of his Paschal Table. Such is the sole authentic source of the date of the Patrician advent. The consulship in question belonged to A.D. 432² and is consequently antedated by one year in the present Annals.

with two Easters regarding which the East and West differed. The first was that of 444. The year was one of the two for which the computation failed to assign a canonical (Roman) Easter. The festival was April 23. This was likewise the Alexandrine date; but being, as we have seen, later than the Petrine term, April 21, Leo requested Cyril of Alexandria to agree in adopting March 26, the corresponding Sunday of the previous lunation. In disregard of the Athanasian precedent, Cyril refused.¹ Whereupon, the Pope consulted Paschasinus, bishop of Lilybaeum in Sicily, but with the same result. To avert disunion, April 23 was acquiesced in by the West. It was perhaps the (lost) reply of Cyril on this occasion that suggested the Epistle fabricated in his name, in support of the Alexandrine system, in Ireland.

A.D. 455 ;
Letter of Pope Leo
to Pas-
chasinus ;

The second was the Easter of 455. Respecting this, Leo, as early as 451, concluded a letter to Paschasinus by observing that Theophilus² appointed April 24, a day altogether at variance with ecclesiastical rule; April 17 being assigned in the Roman Paschal Cycles. Once more, there can be little doubt, the reply, as in the case of 444, was unfavourable. Two years later, the Pope addressed Marcian, emperor of the East, on the subject. He began by stating³ that, to obviate two Easters in one

That Leo's request was to hold the feast on March 26, appears from the case in point quoted by Paschasinus : in 417, the Romans would not celebrate on April 22, but on March 25, whence a most serious error [!]. Sicut evenit... anno consulatus Honorii Aug. XI. et Constantii bis. Tunc enim, cum declinaretur ne x. Kal. Mai. die Pascha teneretur, celebratum est viii. die Kal. Apr. . . et error gravissimus est ortus (ib.).

² Theophilus.—Theophilus viii. Kl. Maias constituit observandum, quod regula ecclesiastica penitus invenimus alienum ; in nostris autem paschalibus cyclis . . . xv. Kl. Maias eiusdem anni pascha celebrandum esse sit scriptum (ib. 929).

year, the Nicene Fathers took measures [not by composing a decemnovennial cycle, as Dionysius fabricated, but] by delegating the whole question to the bishop of Alexandria (the Egyptians being reputed to have traditional knowledge of this computation), who was every year to notify the day to the Apostolic See, thence to be communicated by letters to the remoter Churches. But, he went on, Theophilus, in his 100-year List, laid down a date different from that of others. In his 74th year (A.D. 453), they kept his April 12; in his 75th (454), they would keep his April 4 (March 28 is given by 84 and 84 (12). The concession was plainly made to be reciprocated). But, for the 76th (455), a day is given unauthorized by any precedent, any calculation, since the Passion,—i.e., April 24, which far exceeds the ancient, constituted (Petrine) limit; whilst others assign April 17; the legitimate Paschal limits being (according to the 84 (12,) March 22—April 21. The occasional incidence on April 22, 23, is justified to some extent, on the ground that, although the Resurrection falls outside, the Passion falls within, the limit. But to prolong to April 24 is too unusual¹, too overt a transgression. The emperor was accordingly requested to direct the Egyptians, or others, if such there were, skilled in such reckoning, to solve the scruple, so that all should celebrate in accordance with tradition and within the term.

On the same day (June 15, 453), another letter was despatched which clearly expresses the object of the first. After stating the matter whereon the emperor had been written to, bishop Julianus, papal legate at Constantinople, was enjoined² to frequently suggest to Marcian to same ;

Not content with the imperial reply that the matter had been referred to the Egyptians, Leo again wrote (Jan. 454) to Julianus that the Paschal date should be inquired into, so that all occasion of error¹ might be removed ; adding a fresh argument, that in the Roman Annals April 17 was most plainly appointed and Easter had been so celebrated. Julianus was finally urged to act with more vigour in the matter. Two months passed and, on March 10, a third letter to Julianus concluded by directing him to intimate² to the emperor, in the name of the Pope and with more insistence, to have the reply sent, as the day was drawing nigh for the Pope to know what date to insert in the Formatae,³ or Communicatory Letters of Paschal notification.

Reply of Proterius :

At length, the response so long and so anxiously awaited, a letter sent through Marcian from Proterius of Alexandria, came to hand. But it proved a sore disappointment, rendered all the more galling by the tone of undisguised triumph. The emperor, it began, not from himself, but moved⁴ by the letters of his Holiness, had written that, some having deemed the Easter in question not rightly assigned, the matter should be studied more closely. This had been done (especially in pursuance of receipt of a papal communication⁵), partly from the Books of the Law, partly from the institutes of the ancients. Moreover, the whole of the Theophilan 100-year List⁶ had been gone through and found so per-

Rather, let it be celebrated as a Centennial List of the same most holy father, Theophilus, had it, and which accorded with the List of the elders, namely, on the 29th day of the month Pharmuthi, according to the Egyptians, which is the 8th of the Kalends of May [April 24]. "For so both we and the entire Egyptian region and the whole Orient are to celebrate the day, with the help of God."

Alexandrine date, April 24, refusal to deviate from;

Lest, however, this should be considered mere dogmatism,² proof is given, substantially the Alexandrine contention we have already seen, that when moon 14 fell on Sunday, Easter was to be put off for a week. Four instances are quoted (with the years numbered in the Diocletian Era): A.D. 373, 377, 387, 444 (Diocletian Nos., 89, 93, 103, 160). A.D. 550 (Diocletian No. 266), he added³ somewhat officiously, would be the same as 455 (No. 171). To assert that to hold Easter in the second [lunar] month is to celebrate in Pharmuthi is to be misled by the Jews, who, as they know not God, know not the Pasch. The Alexandrine Fathers, on the other hand, drew up the decemnovennial cycle under the guidance of the Holy Spirit. The letter concluded with a long-drawn declamatory statement, to the effect that the lunar month which commences on April 4 is the first, not the second.

The circumstances explain and perhaps to some extent justify the tenor and temper of the foregoing. Had Proterius, like his predecessor, Cyril, been consulted directly and informed, in addition (for the matter could hardly fail to be recorded in the Roman Paschal Annals), that Athanasius, as his Festal Letters were there to prove, conformed more than once to the Petrine tradition; whilst, in the Roman computation, moon 14 would not fall on April 17 in 455, the response, it is fair to infer, would have been different. Instead, the thinly veiled coercive course was adopted of approaching him through the secular power, to amend a date, which, whether Theophilan or scribal, was judged to be erroneous mainly on the ground that it differed from the Roman.

Leo,

Leo wisely averted the imminent crisis. In acknowledging receipt (May, 454) to Marcian, he acquiesced, he stated, not¹ as convinced by the reasoning, but persuaded by his desire for unity. In the ensuing March, he wrote to the emperor that he had communicated to all the priests of the Western parts the day intimated² in the Instruction of the Alexandrine bishop, that, laying aside all scruple, in zeal for unity and peace, Easter should be celebrated on April 24. Among those whom the papal notification reached, the entry in the present Annals³ and in the Annals of Innisfallen⁴ shows, were the Irish. How the Curia estimated the pertinacious intent of Proterius appears in the account of the transaction with which Prosper brought his Chronicle¹ to a close.

The mention of the Easter Calendar days, March 22—April 21, proves that the 84 (12) was the official Cycle at the time. The chief result of the protracted question was that, to obviate similar sinister differences, Victorius of Aquitaine was employed to compose a cycle. What that was, has been shown above.

The earliest evidence of a different Paschal system in Ireland is supplied in the *Acts*² of the Council of Caesarea, a fabrication known to Bede as the Synodical Epistle of Theophilus, from which he gravely quotes³ that the Passion took place on March 22 and the Resurrection on March 25. Whereupon, the scholiast, Bridefert, for once incisively and appositely annotates:⁴ "I am surprised why any one brought a thing so absurd back to memory." The Tract opens with the statement that, after the Apostles died, there were different Easters and fasting periods of varying duration. The Gauls⁵ held the feast on March 25; the East, on whatever day the 14th of the moon fell. To secure uniformity, Pope Victor directed Theophilus to convene the bishops of his province in his metropolitan see of Cæsarea, in Palestine. Having duly met, Theophilus and the bishops in the approved computistic method of question and answer, fixed the Creation on the Roman Equinox, March 25. They decided likewise that Easter was to be held on Sunday. But the gist lies in a query of the convener: Since the Lord suffered on March 22, and rose on March 25, was it not impious to exclude March 22, 23, 24 from the Paschal limit? The bishops, as was to be expected, replied that it was, and that these three days should be included. It was accordingly decreed¹ that the Easter limits should be March 22—April 21; with Paschal lunar days, 14—21.

gist,

tion,

As the Acts of the Cæsarean Council, convened² at the instance of Victor by Theophilus, in the matter of the Quartadecimans, are lost, the fabricator may have known that his work was not likely to be detected by collation with the original. Be that as it may, he fatally betrayed himself in one particular: March 25 was the Roman, not the Eastern, equinoctial date.

The object was to maintain the 84, with modifications, against a Table having Easter on March 22, 23, 24. Easters placed on April 19, 20, 21, because of objection to Easter before March 25, D, E, F of Table Q show, occur in nine years. Of these, two, April 20 (XX. E), and 21 (X. F), if held on March 23 and 24, would fall on moon 21. The Fathers, in their wisdom, obviated the difficulty by adding a lunar day. This provision had the additional advantage that the two uncanonical ²Convened.—A.D. 197, according to Petavius (De doc. temp. II. 392).

Easters, April 22 (XVIII. G) and 23 (XXVII. A) could be held on March 25, 26, moon 21.

Assuming, for reasons to be stated, that the Victorian ^{date,} was the cycle intended, and that the purpose was to ^{A.D. 508} prove the adaptability of the 84, the date may be approximately fixed. In 509, the Easter of 84 fell on April 19; in the previous lunation, it would fall on March 22, coinciding with the Victorian, and proving that, with an enlarged limit, the 84 need not be superseded. The forgery may consequently be dated 508.

Later, a similar production saw the light in the *Tractate*¹ of St. Athanasius, bishop of Alexandria, on the Paschal system. This is an exposition of the bald ^{(2) Athanasian tractate:} statements of the Cæsarean Acts and of the pinax, or ^{purport,} Paschal table, drawn up by elders in accordance with the Cæsarean decree, that Easter was to be celebrated neither before March 22, nor after April 21. The fabricator betrays himself Irish in a method² of lunar reckoning taken from 84, XIII. and in determining the Equinox.³ ^{proofs of fabrication,} Spring has three months, of which not alone the middle month, but the middle day of the middle month, gave beginning to the world. From Feb. 9 (beginning of Spring) to March 11 is one month; thence to March 25 are 15 days, i.e., half a month: total, one month and a half. But the Athanasian Equinox, he either forgot, or more probably knew not, was March 21; whence, reasoning as here represented, the putative author should have reckoned Spring from Feb. 5. On the other hand, the Roman Spring began on Feb. 7.⁴ The fanciful calculation, in fact, was based on the half-quarter (leth-ratha), a native measure of time.

It is further laid down that, when (as in the Cæsarean Acts) moon 14 and Sunday coincide¹, Easter is to be celebrated; but, as this cannot always happen, to ensure Sunday incidence, the lunar days are to be extended to moon 21.

The forgery is evidence that the Festal Letters of Athanasius were known, most probably by repute, in Ireland. As to the date, the '*pinax*² drawn up by the elders' indicates a fairly considerable time. This would agree with 547. In that year, the Easter of 84 was April 21; in the previous lunation, it would be March 24, the Victorian day. The imposture, we may consequently conclude, was issued in 546, to prove that the old system need not be discarded in favour of the new.

For textual distortion, resourceful invention and vituperative scorn, the spurious Anatolius stood peerless in the field of fabrication. Nor was his triumph confined to his own time. Columbanus³ quoted his dicta as binding on a Pope; the defenders⁴ of rival Paschal methods appealed to him in support of their respective contentions; Bede⁵ vainly taxed his skill to reconcile the contradictions of the "holy man"; Bucherius⁶, the first

So hard does inveterate error die!

The *Book*⁴ of Anatolius on the Paschal system begins preamble, by stating that the error of Paschal cycles arose from attending to lunar, to the neglect of solar, computation, though each is taken into account in Hebrew and Greek volumes. Of such, Hippolytus composed a cycle from certain unknown [!] lunar courses; some, making a cycle of 25 [95] years, others, one of 30 [?], not a few, one of 84, never reached the true Paschal method. But their predecessors, most versed in Hebrew and Greek books, namely, Isidore⁵ [of Pelusium, A.D. 450], Jerome [420], and Clement [100], though beginning the months differently, attained one and the same most certain Paschal method. Evidently the writer took Cal-

most perspicacious in calculation (hence named Calcenterus), issued a [spurious] book on the Pasch, showing that regard should be had to the course of the moon, the passing of the Equinox, and the progress of the sun. A passage is then quoted from this fabricated work, after which the subject is said to have been undertaken to fulfil a promise.

Next follows the excerpt from the Prologue to the lost Anatolian Paschal Table, taken from Rufinus' Version of the Ecclesiastical History of Eusebius. The falsification¹ occurs in the opening sentence. "Now, in the first year, the beginning of the first month, which is the beginning of the 19-year cycle, is, according to the Egyptians, Faminoth 26; according to the Macedonians, Dystri 22; but, according to the Romans, March 25, namely, the 8th of the Kalends of April." Needless to say, the text of Rufinus has: "according to the Romans, 11th of the Kalends of April" (March 22). Besides, to represent Anatolius counting the days of the Roman month directly in this context is an original and droll conceit.

The final sentence² of the genuine Anatolian extract states that, on the Equinox, when moon 14 is opposite the sun, the latter is in the Vernal part, the former in the Autumnal; whence the 14th should be after the Equinox. Accordingly, Easter (the fabrication proceeds) was to be held when one day had passed after the Equinox, i.e., March 26, moon 14—20. The extension to moon 20 arises, because it is impossible to have March 26, moon 14, on Sunday every year; whilst moon 14, though it does not fill all the night, still, if it rises in the second vigil (9—12 p.m.), illumines the greater part thereof. [To show the source of this, the Athanasian Tractate, explaining the moon 14—21 of the Cæsarean Acts, says: "But¹ the moon, although, extended to its 21st part, it does not fill all the night, still illumines the greater part thereof." This, in turn, was based on the moon 30 = moon 1 of XIII. of the 84 and proves that the author of the Tractate was Irish too.]

Certainly, (the impostor continues to expound) if the rise of the moon is delayed until midnight, light over-comes not darkness, but vice versa; although it is not possible that darkness should to any degree dominate light; for the solemnity of the Resurrection is light and there is no communication between it and darkness. And if the moon shine out in the third vigil (12 p.m.—3 a.m.), it is undoubtedly the 21st or 22nd [i.e., moon 21 = m. 22, by the equation explained above], whereon the true Pasch cannot be immolated. They² who decide that it can, not alone are unable to affirm this by Scripture authority, but they incur the crime of sacrilege and contumacy and peril of souls, in asserting that the true light, which dominates all darkness, can be offered during the prevalence of darkness.

This paragraph is of interest from being cited at length in the letter of Columbanus to Pope Gregory on the Paschal question.

Next, the rule of not celebrating Easter later than the 20th of the moon is declared not to be contrary, as some Gallic computers affirm, to what is read in Exodus³ about eating unleavened bread from the 14th to the

[The reference is to the Cæsarean Acts, which direct the Mosaic command of observing from the 14th to the 21st to be kept, and to the explanation of the extension to the 21st in the Athanasiam Tractate.] The error arose from their ignorance that [according to the perversion already mentioned of the principle of the 84, XIII.] moon 13 and moon 14, and so on, to 20 and 21, fall on one day [i.e., moon 13 to 12.30 p.m., moon 14 thenceforward]. "Compute¹ therefore from the end of the 13th moon, which is the beginning of the 14th, to the end of the 20th, whence the beginning of the 21st commences, and you will find only 7 days, whereon the Pasch of the Lord is to be offered. But, what wonder if they erred in the 21st of the moon, who added three days before the Equinox, whereon they decide the Pasch can be offered. Which certainly is in every way absurd, even to suppose, since it has been clearly laid down by the most explicit historiographers of the Jews and by the Seventy Seniors that the Pasch could not be offered on the Equinox."

Sed quid mirum, si in xxi. luna erraverint, qui tres addiderunt dies ante aequinoctium, in quibus pascha immolari posse definiunt? Quod certum est omnimodis etiam putari absurdum, cum apertissimis Iudaeorum historiographis [sic] et lxx. senioribus evidenter difinitum sit, pascha in aequinoctio immolare non posse.

"But there was no difficulty for those to whom it was lawful to celebrate the Pasch when moon 14 fell after the Equinox: whose example is followed even to this day by all the Asian bishops, who adopt the rule of John and not that of the successors of Peter and Paul, who taught that the Resurrection is to be celebrated only on Sunday. Whence contention arose between their respective successors, namely, Victor, bishop of Rome, and Policrates, primate of Asia, which was amicably decided by Irenæus, chief bishop of Gaul, each side observing its traditional rule."

The mystical significance of each of the two celebrations is then set forth, after which the objection is solved that the Pasch of light cannot be celebrated, except on moon 14. This leads to the main contention: some¹ sage and most acute persons laid down that it is impossible to find Sunday after the Equinox, and not exceeding moon 20, in that confined and briefest space of a 19-year circle. But, to manifestly convince their incredulity, he will give that circle with the course of the moon, prefixing the days in which the year revolves, reckoned on Kalends, Nones, Ides, and last days of months. Of the numeration which follows (whereof the solar portion is given in Table B), the January items will suffice to show the arrangement.

As regards the solar years, the initial and final are common : the 19 years, consequently, the ferial incidence of March 25 proves, are intended to form a decemnovennial solar cycle ! This is effected by employing but two bissextile years. As an idle calculation, the cycle is accurate : it contains 6937 days, or 991 weeks. The forger doubtless anticipated, with what prescience time has shown, that it would escape notice that 19 actual years, whether Egyptian or Julian, have, at least, 4 bissextiles, or 991 weeks, and 2 days. In fact, the 19 here given contain 5 leap-years. The wonder is to find Bucherius imposed upon by so transparent a device. Expressed in Dominical Letters, the two sequences are :—

The two leap-years, it will have been noticed, are the 7th and 17th. The Book was composed after the Athanasian Tractate, and, as will be seen, before the departure, about A.D. 590, of Columbanus from Ireland. It would enhance the deception to have the week-days and Easters of such a venerable document identical, as far as possible, with those that could be easily verified. This makes it probable that the solar cycle tampered with was that which began at 550, a year which—hardly an undesigned coincidence—was the first but one of the cycle of 84. As the reckoning is made on March 25, No. 3 is accurate for that day. So likewise are the other Nos., to the 10th, inclusive. With exception of Nos. 5 and 9, the correct years have the same Easters of those of 84. Nos. 6, 7, 8 have accordingly the same ferial and Paschal incidence in the two cycles. The fabrication may consequently be assigned to No. 7, A.D. 556.

Respecting the Paschal dates, the Table given on next page will show what an impossible work the forger essayed. In the first place, the initial epact is not that of Anatolius. Secondly, the Saltus is inserted (not in the last year, as in the normal decemnovennial cycle, but), owing to ignorance or forgetfulness of the part assumed, in the 14th, in accordance with the cycle most familiar to the fabricator. Thirdly, the same 19 Easters always recur, and in the same sequence; excluding March 25, 26, days never omitted, and including April 22, 23, days never observed, by the Irish. Finally, the remainder of the Table is made up of dates derivable from the pseudo-Anatolian epacts used with the true solar cycle: they include March 23, although 24 is railed against as too early, and April 25, a day two days later than the cyclic date. Sed quis in scriptis spuriis certitudinem præstabit?

The Dominical Letters are arranged to show the sequence of the 19 pretended recurrent Easters, which, with the respective lunar days, are given in heavier type.

This cycle¹ the writer continues, is not approved of by some African (? Gallican) computists, who wrote more ample cycles, as being contrary to their opinion, that Easter should be from March 22 to April 21,—limits² not alone not to be followed, but to be detested and cut away. After proof of this, the Book concludes with an account, in response to the second alleged request,³ of the ascent and descent of the sun, i.e. diminution of days and nights, from Dec. 25 to March 25, June 24, Sep. 24, Dec. 25; which is, and most probably was intended to be, an enigma.

Besides the internal evidence, we have the testimony of Columbanus that Anatolius was directed against the Victorian Paschal system. A cycle at variance with the fixed Julian years, it needed no profound computistic skill to discover, would be worthless. The intent, however, was not to employ such, but to perpetuate, whilst nominally condemning, the 84, as the sole system that enabled the divine precept of celebrating Easter from the 14th to the 20th of the moon to be carried into effect. How well it succeeded with the Northern Irish (the fabricator, we can hardly doubt, was himself an Ultonian), appears from the subsequent history of the controversy.

Intent.

The next defender of the 84 was Saint Columbanus. His Paschal observance was strenuously opposed by the bishops of Gaul, who naturally followed the Table of their compatriot, sanctioned, as it had been, by a National Council.⁴ Accordingly, in a letter (600) to

Gregory the Great, he defended the 84 and impugned Victorius in a strain that shows with what confidence he advocated his cause. He begins by requesting¹ the Pontiff's opinion respecting Easter on the 21st, or 22nd, of the moon; which, be it said without offence, is fully proved by many computists not to be an Easter, as being of darkness. It has not escaped, he believes, the Pope's ability to what extent Anatolius, a man of wondrous learning, as Jerome says, whose work was cited by Eusebius and lauded by Jerome, reasoned in vituperating this age of the moon, and passed a dreadful sentence against Gallic calculators, erring, as he said, regarding Easter. He then quotes the long passage of the spurious Anatolius, relative to the 21st and 22nd of the moon, the substance of which has been already given.²

How, he proceeds, can either of these two things reasonably stand: the Resurrection to be before [the traditional date, March 25, of the] Passion, which even to suppose is absurd; or the 7 days, moon 14—20, during which alone the Pasch was to be legitimately eaten, be extended, contrary to what is just and lawful? Why³ then does one so sage approve of an Easter of darkness? He is surprised, he confesses, that this error of Gaul has not been eliminated by the Pope long ago, unless perhaps, what he can scarce believe, that not to onymus . . . hoc idem de Pascha opus collaudavit., de hac lunae aetate vituperando disputet: qui contra Gallicanos rimarios, de Pascha (ut ait) errantes, horrendam intulit sententiam (P. L. LXXX. 260).

have amended has arisen from having sanctioned. For let him know¹ that by their [religious] masters and by Irish antiquaries, philosophers and computists most skilled in the art of calculation, Victorius has not alone not been received, but has been deemed deserving of derision or pity, rather than authority.

After all the² authors he has read, he is not satisfied with the unique opinion of those [Gallic] bishops: We ought not to make the Pasch with Jews. For, how is this pertinent? Are reprobate Jews to be believed to make the Pasch, who are now without a temple and away from Jerusalem, since they crucified Christ? Is this 14th of the moon to be believed their's and not rather acknowledged as of God himself, who alone perfectly knew by what mystery the 14th was selected for the Pasch? Let³ those who thus object reproach God why, if he wished us not to make the Pasch with them, did his prescience not obviate the contumacy of the Jews, by prescribing 9 days of unleavened bread in the Law, so that the beginning of our solemnity should not exceed the end of their's? For, if the Pasch is to be celebrated on the 21st or 22nd, 9 days will be computed, from the 14th to the 22nd: 7, namely, prescribed by God and 2 added by men. But, if men can of themselves add anything to divine decision, is not this, ut, si nollet nos cum eis Pascha facere, novem dies azymorum in Lege praeciperet, ut vel nostrae solemnitatis initium finem solemnitatis eorum non excederet? Nam, si in xxi. aut xxii. Pascha celebrandum, a xiv. usque ad xxii. novem dies computabuntur: vii. scilicet a Deo praecepti et ii. ab hominibus aucti. Sed, si licet hominibus augere per se aliquid divinae censurae, interrogo, ne forte videatur contrarium esse illi Deuteronomii sententiae: Ecce (inquit) verbum quod tibi do: neque adicias ad illud, neque auferas ab eo [Deut. iv. 20] (ib. 262).

Gallic opinion, that 14th-day celebration is Jewish, devoid of foundation.

he asks, contrary to the sentence of Deuteronomy: Behold the word which I give you, you shall not add thereto, neither shall you take therefrom?

To excuse
Victorius
is to condemn
Jerome.

It is therefore for the Pope either to excuse or condemn Victorius; knowing¹ that, if he shall praise him, it will be a question of believing either himself or Jerome, that lauded Anatolius, who was opposed to Victorius: so that he who follows the one cannot receive the other.

Again, in his letter (603) to the Fathers of the Council of Chalons-sur-Saone (convened to discuss his case, but which he refused to attend, on the ground chiefly that he had dealt with the subject in three tomes sent to the Pope, and in a briefer libellus presented to their brother bishop, Arigius [archbishop of Lyons]), he states² that all the Western churches do not admit the Resurrection to be before the Passion, i.e., Easter before the Equinox [March 25], and do not go beyond the 20th of the moon. He likewise confesses³ that he trusts more in the tradition of his native land, to celebrate Easter according to the calculation of 84 and of Anatolius, rather than according to Victorius, lately writing dubiously and, where such was necessary, deciding nothing, as he himself has testified in his Prologue: who, after the times of Martin, Jerome and pope Damasus, wrote [a cycle to last] during 103 years, under Hilarus. The national disdain for one who declines to take a side appears in the sarcastic and somewhat misleading reference to the avowed neutrality of Victorius.

Scilicet cum ibi memoretur Victorius, 'qui post tempora domini Martini et domini Hieronymi et papae Damasi post centum et tres annos sub Hilario conscripsit,' ea computatio, cum Victorius canonem elaboraverit a. 457, ducit ad a. 354, in quo finit Chronographus; neque id aliqua probabilitate caret [!], quamquam Damaso [366-84] a Columbano computatio illa non magis tribuitur quam Martino [ob. 397] vel Hieronymo [ob. 420] neque recte tribui potest, cum corpus id de quo agitur ante scriptum sit quam is papa factus

But, owing, no doubt, to the chilling fact that the Letter of tomes failed to elicit any response from the Curia, no trace of confidence is observable in a letter directed to a successor (most likely, Sabinian) of Gregory. He sends,¹ he states, the writings addressed by him (and which Satan twice prevented the bearers from delivering) to Pope Gregory to be inquired into; since the books of their province proceed not on the Paschal Terms of the book of those Gauls, which is not received (even) in two places by their masters, as shown in said epistles.

Sabinian,

He beseeches² the Pope to grant to laborious pilgrims petition est neque usquam in eo nomen eius adsit" (M. G. H. SS. Antiqss. IX. Chronica Minora, ed. Mommsen, p. 34).

The qualified 'probability' is readily disposed of. Columbanus was not so ignorant as to imply that the number in question applied to any of the three first-named. He had before him the per annos centum et duos futuros of the Prologue: to these he rightly added the initial year, giving 103 as the prospective Victorian Paschal years. Post is, accordingly, an error for per.

reason therefor,

It is plain they are within their own (Irish) country in rejecting the Gallic rules: seated in the desert, with the rules of their seniors, in defence of which he addressed Gregory and the Gallic Fathers (the letter to the latter being enclosed). As those who were tumultuous rather than reasoning could not be convinced, they postulate authorization to live as Polycarp and pope Anicetus taught,—separated in perfect charity, each preserving what he received.

The valediction¹ bids the pope be mindful to decide for them in accordance with the 150 authors of the [Second Ecumenical] Synod of Constantinople [A.D. 381], who judged that churches of God placed among barbarous nations should live, as taught by (their) fathers, by their own laws.

The canon inaptly adduced in support of this untenable claim to exemption from the local episcopal jurisdiction is the second, which concludes² thus: But the churches of God in barbarous peoples are to be administered according to the prevalent patristic custom [not in the manner defined in the part of the canon immediately preceding].

With the expulsion of the founder, the observance of the 84, it is scarcely open to doubt, ceased in the 84 disused in Luxeuil. At all events, a Calendar, itself replaced by Victorian; a copy, carried thence to the abbey of Corbie before 657 has the Victorian Paschal data¹ exclusively.

March 22.—Here begins the time of the Paschal limit [earliest Easter].

April 24.—Here ends the time of the Paschal limit [latest Easter].

Though no proof is forthcoming, the cycle first followed in Bobbio, it can hardly be questioned, was the 84. For the evidence respecting the introduction and use of the Victorian Cycle after the time of the first abbot, the reader is referred to the valuable essay² of Dr. Bruno Krusch: the Introduction of the Grecian Paschal system into the West.

Shortly after the departure of Columbanus, two remarkable events occurred not far from his alma mater. A Note³ of the eighth or ninth century in the Würzburg Irish copy of St. Matthew states that Mosinu Maccumin, scribe and abbot of Bangor, was the first of the Irish who learned the Computus by rote from a certain Greek. Afterwards, Mocuoroc Maccu Nethsemon, whom the Romans styled Doctor of the whole world, and pupil of the aforesaid scribe, in the island called Crannach of Downpatrick, committed this knowledge to writing, lest it should lapse from memory.

Mosinu, or Sillan.

In the List of Homonymous Saints in the Book of Leinster,¹ Mosinu Maccu Mind² is second of the four under Mosinu. He was also called Sillan, under which name his obit is given in the present Annals, at 610, and the Calendar of Aengus has his feast at Feb. 28. As Sinlanus, he is commemorated in the hymn³ in memory of the abbots in the Antiphonary of Bangor, and styled famous doctor of the world. Of the pupil, Mochuaroc of the Wisdom, founder of Kilcoran, near Youghal, particulars are given under A.D. 1121.

roc, or

Cranny.

Crannach (place of [high] trees) is Cranny Island in the south-western arm of Strangford Lough, a few miles from Downpatrick. The Note is thus of further interest, as showing that the school, whereof the Scriptorium formed part, sometimes lay at some distance outside the monastic enclosure.

Fabricat-
of Cyril :

The Computus in question was, of course, the Alexandrine decemnovennial cycle and it gave occasion to yet another fabrication,⁴ the Epistle of Cyril. In his genuine letter to the Fathers of the Council of Carthage (A.D. 419), St. Cyril states, at the close,⁵ that the Easter of

³ Hymn.—

(Fol. 36b, ll. 16, 17.)

⁴ Fabrication.—First detected by Petavius (op. cit. lib. II. cap. lxx., Vol. I. p. 114), who printed the genuine and supposititious letters (II. 503-4), and proved the Easter of the forgery was that of 607 (ib. 508).

In view of the fact that, not to mention older writers, Ideler, De Rossi and Mommsen did not accept the conclusion of Petavius, the fraud was exposed anew by Krusch, in a manner that obviates cavil (Der 84jährige Cyclus, etc., p. 101-9). The text is given, with variants of six MSS. and two editions (ib. 344-9).

The erroneous textual reading arose from one of the besetting scribal mistakes : the first ii of xiii. were mistaken for u. All the MSS. and one edition have uiiii.

As the Easter for 420 was April 18 in the 84 and 84 (12), the request for information was a complimentary formality.

the next Indiction (A.D. 420), would be the xiiii.th of the Kalends of May (April 18). Xiiii. was made into viii., giving (Friday) April 23 as the Easter day! Pseudo-Cyril, accordingly, desired the Fathers to celebrate on that day, on account of the embolismal year. By celebrating on March 26, moon 22, as they were preparing¹ to do, they would make the embolismal a common year, making Paschal the moon that began on March 5, pursuant to the Latin Rule: Jan. 1, Sunday, moon 27 (= March 26, moon 22). contents,

(Three sections follow, of similar import and equal value; some of the contents of which are cited by Cumman; by the author of the Munich Computus; and by Bede.)

These criteria are not to be found in the 84. They occur in the Victorian Cycle at 691, a date too late, and in the Alexandrine at 607. The forgery thus saw the light in 606. In 607, the 84 and Victorian Easter would be April 16; the Alexandrine, April 23. Moreover, the uncanonical 84 Easter, April 23, would soon recur, in 612. The motive, consequently, was to make known, in anticipation, that Cyril who, it was well known, had composed a Paschal Cycle, had condemned the Latin (Victorian) Rule and approved of a day hitherto never adopted in Ireland. date, introduction, he did not receive the cycle of 532, but devoted the time to the Scripture, history and cycles bearing on the subject. Then come Paschal texts, succeeded by three quotations from Jerome and one citation from Origen, all four not otherwise known. Passion-week events are next set forth: the Lord suffered on Friday, moon 14; lay in the tomb on Saturday, moon 15; arose on Sunday, moon 16. Whence¹ the whole Oriental church assigned a week, 14—20, to the Passion; another 15—21, to the Sepulture; a third, 16—22, to the Resurrection. But if, as they do in Iona, moon 14 is given to the Resurrection, the Sepulture will have moon 13; the Passion, moon 12.

proofs.

Statements follow relative to uniform celebration, from the Acts of Cæsarea and Councils of Nice and Arles. The main contention is now introduced by words attributed to Jerome, that care should be taken not to eat the lamb outside the church. Whence it is manifest that Jews, heretics and conventicles of perverse doctrines, who eat not the lamb within the church, eat not the flesh of the lamb, but of the dragon. Whereupon Cummian asks² those whom he addresses to consider who are the conventicles, whether the Hebrews, Greeks, Latins and Egyptians, all united in observance of the chief solemnities, or the particle of the Britons and Irish, almost the extremes of the world.

nostris celebrari orsus est, non suscepi, sed silui: nec laudare, nec vituperare ausus. . . . Hinc per annum secretus sanctuarium Dei ingressus, hoc est, scripturam sacram, ut valui, involvi; deinde, historias; postremo, cyclos, quos invenire potui (ib.).

² Asks.—Vos considerate quae sunt conventicula quae dixi: utrum Hebraei et Graeci et Latini et Aegyptii, simul in observatione praecipuarum solennitatum uniti, an Britonum Scotorumque particula, qui sunt pene extremi et, ut ita dicam, mentagrae, orbis terrarum: hoc mihi iudicate (ib. 436).

Uniform Paschal celebration being thus gratuitously laid down as a test of church membership, he proceeds to develop a facile theme,—necessity of union with the church. Old and New Testament texts are interspersed with four quotations, not in the editions, of Augustine and two, one genuine, the other spurious, of Jerome, Cyprian and Gregory the Great, respectively. The relevancy will sufficiently appear from one example. After quoting a fabricated Augustinian application of Psalm cxx. (cxxi.) 6 and Exodus xxi. 17, to those who think evil of the church, he asks:¹ “What more derogatory can be thought of mother church, than to say: Rome errs, Jerusalem errs, Antioch errs, Alexandria errs, all the world errs: the Irish and Britons alone think rightly?”

Patristic

Finally, coming to cycles, he found them all, though differing in day and moon, month and bissextile, epact and saltus, contrary to that of those whom he addresses: 1) that brought² and composed by Patrick, their pope, with [Easter on] moon 15 to 21 and Equinox, March 21; (2) Anatolius, whom they extol [but who states] that they who observe the cycle of 84 can never attain to correct Paschal reckoning; (3) Theophilus; (4) Dionysius; (5) Cyril; (6) Morinus; (7) Augustine; (8) Victorius; (9) Pachomius, the monk, founder of the cenobite communities of Egypt, to whom an angel dictated the Paschal system; (10) the decemnovennial cycle of the 318 [Nicene] Fathers, named in Greek Enneacedeciterida [! These¹ he found to be contrary to the 84 (whereof author, place and time are uncertain), in Kalends, bissextile, moon 14, first month, epact and Equinox. Let us scrutinize, as Cyril saith, what the Nicene Synod arranged, the 14th-moons of all years in a decemnovennial cycle (which Victorius in 28 turns, with 532 years and 133 leap-years, made to recur to where it began), lest we be deceived in the moon of the first month. The quotation (the bracketted words being Cumman's; and 28 turns, a deduction unauthorized by the Prologue) is continued, containing nearly the whole of the spurious Epistle of Cyril. After a challenge to test these, or renounce Catholic testimonies, eight New Testament texts, chiefly about not judging others and bearing each others' burdens, follow.

The year being ended, in accordance with Deuteronomy, he consulted his elders, the successors of their former fathers, i.e., Ailbe, bishop [of Emly], Ciaran of Clonmacnoise, Brendan [of Birr], Nessen [of Mungret] and Lugid [Molua of Clonfert-Mulloe], what they thought of the excommunication passed on them by said apostolic sees. They assembled, some in person, others by deputy, in Magh-Lene [probably, near Birr], and decided to celebrate Easter the following year with the universal church. "But,² not long after, arose a white-washed wall, pretending he was preserving the tradition of the elders, who did not make both one, but divided and in part made void what was promised: whom the Lord, as I hope, will smite, in whatsoever way it pleaseth him!"

Then, in pursuance of the synodal decree that major causes were to be referred to the chief city, they sent¹ men of known wisdom and humility, as sons to a mother, whereof some arrived in Rome and returned in the third year, and reported they were in one hospice with a Greek and Jew, Scythian and Egyptian, and with the same in St. Peter's on Easter (in which the Irish were separated by a whole month), and they testified: Throughout the whole world, this Easter, as we know, is celebrated. "And² we have proof that the power of God was in the relics of holy martyrs and the writings which they brought. We have seen with our eyes a maiden quite blind open her eyes at these relics, a paralytic walk and many demons cast out."

These things he said, not to impugn Segene and Beccan, but to defend himself, hiding like a night-crow in his domicile. He concludes with an apology for any rudeness of language. How far this was called for, one instance will show. After citing the fabricated testimony of Augustine, he proceeds. "And this, I beg, look diligently into, that you may excuse or direct me by your words, or by producing writings more powerful and more certain, if any you have, for understanding the other better sense, and I will accept it gratefully, as I have adopted this. But, if you have not, be silent and call us not heretics."

of fact and fiction in existence. Passing over the chronology that places Dionysius before Cyril and Victorius, the description of the Patrician cycle is demonstrably false; Anatolius is the native patchwork; Morinus is the Irish fictitious Morianus, fictitious bishop of Alexandria, whose Epistle,¹ De ortu Paschali, was written against the Victorian Cycle; Augustine, composer of a cycle, is as mythical as Morinus; the revelation² to Pachomius is taken from the Epistle of Cyril; finally, the cycle of the Nicene Fathers is the well-known falsification³ of the monk Dionysius.

As regards the date, Segene was abbot of Iona from 623 to 652. During his incumbency, the difference of a month between the Easters kept in Rome and Ireland occurred in 631 and 642: the Victorian and Alexandrine being March 24; the Irish, April 21. The letter was apparently written soon after the return of the delegates, in the third year; namely, either in 632 or 643. Of

The conclusion is Appendix XXIII. of C.H.B. IV. (Chronicon Paschale tome, p. 386), with heading: De Paschate Judaeorum, and is likewise given by Jan (Historia Cycli Dionysiani: P.L. LXVII. 430) as the end of a disputation de ratione Paschali of Morinus, bishop of Alexandria, from the Bodleian MS., Digby 63. The texts of Muratori and Jan are practically the same; the (bracketted) C.H.B. variants, quite in keeping with the original galimatias, indicate an independent source. Apparently, the editors took the tract to be genuine.

Dionysius before Victorius was too much for Du Cange. Accordingly, he prints Dionysii Exigui in Italics and notes on the margin: Forte est glossema. On Joseph he makes no remark.

² Revelation.—This and another passage from the writing of "blessed Cyril, bishop of Alexandria," relative to the moonstone cycle are two of the "indications of divine authority" adduced by Bede in support of the Alexandrine luni-solar reckoning (De temp. rat. xliii.).

Aidan, bishop of Lindisfarne (634—651), Bede narrates¹ that he kept Easter from the 14th to the 20th of the moon, the Northern Irish thus celebrating; whilst the Southern had already, by papal admonition, learned to hold the canonical feast. This refers to what he states elsewhere, that Pope Honorius wrote² to the Irish, exhorting them not to think their small number, on the uttermost bounds of the earth, to be wiser than all the ancient and modern churches of Christ throughout the world and not to celebrate a different Easter, contrary to the Paschal calculation and synodical decrees of the bishops of the universe. The admonition in question, there can be no reasonable doubt, occasioned the proceedings described by Cumman. The dates may, accordingly, be assigned as follows: papal epistle arrived, 629; synod held: delegates set out, 630; delegates in St. Peter's, 631; delegates returned: letter of Cumman written, 632.

With respect to the author, a monk resident in Ireland, addressing a defence to the abbot of Iona, is proved to have belonged to one of the Irish Columban monasteries. Of these, the chief was Durrow, which lay close to the Southern Half of the Island. Furthermore, to have his decision so long waited for and to have exercised the dominant influence described, Cumman, in addition to his repute as computist, must have held a position of influence, such as, we know, the abbatial was in the Early Irish Church. Segene, the tenor shows, declined to take part in the synod; Cumman was accordingly present as abbot of Durrow, not as representative of the successor of Columba. Hence the occasion and spirit of the communication: co-ordinate

Easter already corrected in most of S. I. : East,

Though scarce a fourth was represented in the Synod, the Southern Half of Ireland, Bede states, adopted the correct calculation, owing to the papal exhortatio. This apparent inconsistency admits, in great part, of satisfactory explanation. Almost simultaneously with that of Magh-Lene, another meeting,¹ presided over by the local king, was held in Slievemargy, Queen's co., to hear a discussion between Laserian, abbot, afterwards bishop, of Leighlin, and Munnu, abbot of Taghmon, co. Wexford: the former, advocating the new (Paschal) Order that lately came from Rome; the latter, defending the old. Munnu retired unconvinced,—a fact which goes to prove that the maintenance of the observance introduced by Fiac was thenceforth confined in the East to the diocese of Ferns.

Suibne, son of Domnall, is mentioned in the tract on the Omargy septs (Bk. of Lnstr. 313b, 50-1) and in the list of Omargy kings (ib. 337f, 65-6). The following table shows the descent and the connection with Fiac:—

Cormac, son of Dermot, is said to have granted an Emly (not identified) to Comgall of Bangor (B.L. 314a, 60-1). As fresh proof

Towards the North West, from the prayer¹ in (the N. West, Canon of) the Stowe Missal for the conversion of a pagan king and his people, we learn that part (in the present diocese of Killaloe) was still heathen; whilst, from the inclusion of Laurentius, Mellitus and Justus in (the Canon² of) the same Missal, we can infer that part had adopted the system recommended by those bishops to the episcopate and abbots of Ireland.

In the South, Lismore, founded after Mochuaroc of ^{South:—} the Wisdom set up on the yew-clad slope by the mouth of Avonmore, knew no other than the Computus brought from Cranny of Downpatrick to Kilcoran. From the monastery of Cuaran, the Alexandrine cycle ^{Lismore,} ^{Ardmore,} passed across to adjacent Ardmore.

The transition, it has to be borne in mind, involved no violent change. It was, in fact, practically imperceptible. The comparatively few differences between the two systems, we have seen,³ were duly noted by Victorius. All that had of the agreement of native authorities and the amount of authentic history omitted from the extant Annals, he is the Cormacus, filius Diarmada, of the Acts of St. Fintan of Clonenagh, who was for a long time king of South Leinster, abdicated in old age and died a saintly death as monk of Bangor (Lanigan, E.H.I. II. 67-8).

Cernach, son of Flann, who died, according to the present Annals, in 766, was sixth in descent (not in the regal line) from a brother of Suibne (B.L. 313b, 30-37).

According to the regnal list, Domnall, son of Aed, slain in 1042, was Donnchad, and Muircertach O'Tracey, who died in 1057, was son of said Donnchad, and ggs. of Tressach, eponymous head

Aghadoe,
Ardfert.

Respecting Aghadoe and Ardfert, we are happily freed from conjecture. Faithlenn,¹ founder of the monastery on the matchless island thence fittingly named Innisfallen, was son of Aed Daman, king of West Munster. Naturally, the donation was made by his father, and consequently before 631, the year of the king's demise.² The Annals of the abbey were based,³ in the early portion, partly on the Table of the Aquitanian. And that the Cycle was used for the primary purpose, is proved by the large number of years having no historical items attached. This being so, for such as were committed to no method, knowledge that the Alexandrine was the more accurate sufficed of itself to induce the requisite alteration.

Synod

Thus it fell out that the South, for by far the greater portion, had no concern in the Synod. Seeing, however, that the important discovery of the independent existence of the most correct cycle was only recently made, Bede may well be condoned for erroneously assigning the cause of the change.

Easter from the 16th to the 22nd of the moon, exclusively designates the Victorian. Under the circumstances, the evidence is conclusive that, towards the middle of the seventh century, the cycle of the Aquitanian was still used in the Curia. The reason lay in the very characteristic contemned by Columbanus,—marking the different Easters, and leaving the selection to the decision of the pontiff.

On the other hand, Bede represents the Letter of the Roman Clergy (of which anon) as evidently¹ establishing that Easter is to be sought for between the 15th and 21st of the moon, as was proved in the Council of Nice. But, though he textually cites the opening of the Letter, which mentions the Quartadeciman heresy and the close, dealing with the Pelagian, of the intermediate, or Paschal, portion, he baldly states that it expounded² the system of Paschal observance. In the light of the direct testimony of Cumman, this appears of a piece with his statements that, in the matter of the Easter of 455, Leo rejoiced³ to be laudably vanquished by those who invincibly adhered to the Nicene decrees and 'sent a letter⁴ of thanks, which is given in full, to Proterius!

not the portion of papal letter omitted in Bede; It is surprising how the overwhelming reasons to the contrary escaped the attention of Ussher. The Anglo-Irish Easter controversy had ended; which, moreover, the Victorian system had no connexion with. Besides, Bede was not so well-disposed towards opponents of his infallible Alexandrine, as to suppress a crushing condemnation of the kind. Furthermore, having attacked Victorius in a manner which, he admits,³ admirers of the Aquitanian might consider unadvised, why quote in justification the invective⁴ of an obscure provincial bishop, to the exclusion of a pronouncement proceeding from the head of the church; except that, as his precis leaves no doubt, the papal words were nothing more than a colourless exhortation to Paschal uniformity? The title, Vitalinus [!], pope of the city of Rome, which imposed on the editor of the Sylloge, it is plain, was the insertion of a reader of Bede, whether at Whitby or elsewhere,

The precious excerpt is the final statement in the *Suggestion*¹ of Boniface, chief secretary of the notaries, to Pope John, relative to the Easter of 526, and is as reliable as the Nicene falsification of his correspondent, the monk Dionysius, with which the Suggestion appropriately opens.² It consequently dates 132 years before the pontificate of Vitalian.

source of, Suggestion of Boniface; a falsehood.

Assuming that he wrote in good faith, this high curial functionary, we thus find, was so unversed in the public correspondence of a renowned pontiff, as to be unaware of the statement of Pope Leo regarding what was done by the Nicene Fathers in the matter of Paschal calculation! Furthermore, having in view some of the known facts, it argues aggravated nescience to assert that the Curia never adopted the Victorian cycle.

Whilst admitting that, according to this, the Digby MS. 'seems to contain the entire Suggestion' (Neues Archiv, 108), Krusch states that Jan's inclusion of Nunquam, etc., was an error arising from his having overlooked the end of Bonifatius' Minute and the beginning of the writing of Vitalian (ib. 158)! Letter from Northern Clergy to Pope, A.D. 640.

Nine years later, the Northern Clergy, on their side, wrote to Rome, in justification of their persistence. The letter arrived shortly before the death of Severinus, in 640. After the papal election, it was opened and a reply, inscribed to eleven named, five bishops, five priests, and one abbot (all of the North, with Thomian, the primate, first), was sent by Hilary, archpriest; John, pope-elect; John, chief secretary; and John, counsellor of the Apostolic See. Bede⁴ (to whose industry we owe what has been preserved of the document) describes the Pas-

The next native evidence bearing on the question belongs to the third quarter of the seventh century. The Catalogue of Irish Saints states that the First and Second Orders (432—598) celebrated¹ one Easter, on the 14th of the moon, after the Vernal Equinox (March 25); the Third Order (598—664), different Easters: they celebrated with obdurate intents, some on the 14th, others on the 16th. The obduracy has manifest reference to the Book of Anatolius on the one side, and the Epistle of Cumman on the other.

The Cycle of 84 was carried by Columba to Iona. Adamnan relates that, on one of his visits to Ireland, while staying at Clonmacnoise, during the incumbency of Ailither² (585—589), the saint prophesied³ concerning the Easter discord between the churches of Ireland. He “could hardly,” Reeves⁴ well observes, “have been ignorant of the discrepancy, yet he evinced no desire to alter the existing practice, and such was the respect for his memory in after times, that the bare fact of his observance of the old rule operated, during more than a century, as the great obstacle to adoption of the Roman Easter in the monastery of Hy and its dependencies.”

It is added,¹ somewhat unnecessarily, that Aidan did not, as some falsely imagined, celebrate on the 14th of the moon, on any week-day, with the Jews, but on Sunday from the 14th to the 20th.

Finan,

Under his Irish successor, Finan (651—661), it was that controversy² on the subject first arose in England: those who had come from Kent and Gaul asserting that the Irish celebrated contrary to the custom of the whole church. Of these, the most aggressive was a compatriot, taught in Gaul or Italy, by name Ronan, whose disputes³ with Finan, whilst convincing many or leading them to enquire, rendered the obstinate bishop more pertinacious and an open adversary. But what mainly led to the crisis was that the king followed what he had seen practised by the Irish, who baptized and taught him; the queen, what she had seen in Kent. Whence⁴

“The inconvenience of the discordant reckonings came practically to the front when, on one occasion [sic], Oswy was keeping his Easter-day with Finan, while Eanfled and her attendants were observing their ‘day of Palms.’ It was a visible discrepancy, such as had occurred . . . when some Irish visitors to Rome found that their fellow-lodgers, a Jew, a Greek, a ‘Scythian’ and an Egyptian, went to St. Peter’s for the Easter service, while they were keeping a Lenten Sunday at home” (Chapters of Early English Church History, by Wm. Bright, D.D., Regius Professor of Ecclesiastical History, Oxford, ed. 3, p. 192).

Considering the source, nonnunquam = on one occasion is a notable equation. Again, “the Irish visitors” found themselves with their fellow-lodgers” in St. Peter’s “for the Easter service.” Those who “were keeping a Lenten Sunday at home” were the Irish in Ireland. To decide the matter, here are the

it is said that occasionally in those times two Easters were celebrated in one year: the king keeping his Easter, while the queen was still fasting on Palm Sunday. Assuming that Oswy and Eanfled were married in 643, the year after his succession to the throne of Northumbria, the divergent Easters were the following.

During one-and-twenty years, until uniformity was enforced in 664, the king's Easter was thirteen times one week earlier; twice, three weeks later, than the queen's,—clear proof, it may be observed in passing, that Bede had no firsthand acquaintance with the cycle of 84; otherwise, in his known zeal for the Alexandrine system, he would not have rested content with an indefinite hearsay number.

Finan was succeeded by a third Irish bishop, Colman. Colman, The advocates of the new calculation deemed the time had now come to determine the controversy in their favour. For the next three years, accordingly, the agitation

In the latter,⁴ Victorius assigned two days: [Greek] March 26, moon 15; Latin, April 2, moon 22. The second date was given, according to the historian, lest the Christians, like the Jews, should celebrate on this [Alexandrine] moon 15! "Wherefore," he proceeds, "many in Gaul celebrated on the 15th of the moon; but we, on the 22nd. We made careful inquiry, however, and the Spanish fonts, which are miraculously filled, were filled up on our Pasch."

The matter having been brought formally under notice of the king, the result, omitting irrelevant details, was a conference¹, in 664, between the opposing disputants, in presence of the king and queen, at Whitby, in Yorkshire. Oswy opened the proceedings, saying they had met to enquire which was the true tradition and to follow same, and then called on Colman. His Easter. the bishop said, he had received² from the elders who sent him: which all their fathers, men beloved of God, were known to have celebrated, and blessed John, the specially beloved disciple, celebrated in all the churches over which he presided. Colman's

second argument.

When Colman expressed surprise that he should call their labour foolish, in following the example of the great apostle, who was worthy to recline on the bosom of the Lord [taken from Anatolius], Wilfrid disclaimed reprehending John, who, like Peter and Paul, had to defer to the Jewish Christians. Hence John began celebration on the evening of the 14th of the first month, on whatever day it fell. But Peter¹, when he preached at Rome, waited, like John, for the 14th, and, if next day was Sunday, began celebration on the 14th; but, if Sunday was not the 15th, but the 16th or any day to the 21st, he waited for such, and began to keep feast on the previous Saturday. This evangelic and apostolic tradition [!] John's successors in Asia and the whole church were converted to. And that this is the true Pasch, which alone is to be celebrated by the faithful, was not newly decreed, but confirmed, by the Nicene Council, as ecclesiastical history teaches.

Whence Colman's party followed neither John, nor Peter; neither Law, nor Gospel. John took no heed of Sunday; the Irish celebrate on that day alone; Peter celebrated from the 15th to the 21st [!]; the Irish, from the 14th to the 20th: often beginning on the evening of the 13th, neither mentioned in the Law, nor sanctioned by the Lord, and thereby excluding the 21st of the moon, contrary to the Law.

In reply, Colman could only ask whether Anatolius, ^{Colman's query re-} a holy man and much lauded in ecclesiastical history, ^{specting Anatolius and Columba,} opposed the spirit of Law and Gospel, in writing that Easter was to be kept from the 14th to the 20th; or their Columba and his successors, men beloved of God, many of them wonder-workers, who kept the feast in the same way? Anatolius, Wilfrid conceded, was most ^{Wilfrid's reply,—} saintly, learned and praiseworthy. But what had they in ^{as to Ana-} common with him who did not observe his instructions? ^{tolius,} He composed¹ a 19-year cycle, which they either knew not, or knowingly contemned, although observed by the universal church. He so calculated the 14th of Easter Sunday, as to have it be the 15th, after the manner of the Egyptians, on the same evening; similarly, the 20th to be the 21st, at close of same day, on Sunday. This distinction they were proved to be ignorant of by the fact that they sometimes most manifestly kept Easter before full moon, i.e., on the 13th. [The reference turned to such good account is to the silly pseudo-Anatolian equation, 13=14, etc., which has been already explained.]

Concerning the sanctity of their Columba and his ^{as to Columba.} successors, far be it from him to retort that, at the judgment, to many saying that they had prophesied and cast out devils and wrought many miracles in His name, the Lord would reply he knew them not, rather would he believe they erred in good faith; no one² having come to show them the better calculation, which, had such arrived, they would, he believed, have adopted. In any case, Colman and his adherents undoubtedly sinned by not following the decrees of the apostolic see, nay of the universal church, and these confirmed by sacred Scripture. For, though their fathers were saintly, was their paucity, in a corner of a most remote island, to be preferred to the entire church? And if that Columba of their's was holy and powerful in miracles, could he be preferred to Peter, to whom the Lord said: Thou art Peter and upon this rock I will build my church, and the gates of hell shall not prevail against it, and to thee I will give the keys of the kingdom of heaven?

Hereupon, the king asked Colman, were these words really said by the Lord to Peter. On his replying yes, the king asked could he produce any such power given to their Columba [!] On his saying not, the king queried whether they both agreed that the words were said to Peter chiefly, and the keys given to him, by the Lord. Both assented, and the king closed the proceedings by declaring¹ that Peter was the doorkeeper whom he would not contradict, but whose commands he would obey, to his knowledge and ability, lest, on going to the gates of heaven, there should be no one to open, the keybearer being his adversary! All present, as was to be expected, sitting and standing, great and small, applauded and, in the approving words of the historian, 'renouncing the less perfect, hastened to conform to the better, institution.'

In the light of the history of the Paschal question, Wilfrid's farrago of fictitious tradition and fabricated testimony can hardly fail to excite a smile. But it proved a grim reality for the vanquished. Colman,¹ seeing, according to the introspective narrative of Bede, his doctrine set at nought and his adherents despised, taking with him such as would follow him (those namely, who would not accept the Catholic [!] Easter and the coronal tonsure, for concerning this too there was no small question), returned to Ireland [Iona], to consult with his own what it behoved them to do in the matter.

How all the Irish were got rid of on this pretext is beside the present question. Suffice it that, according to the present Annals, four years later, Colman, carrying with him the relics of the (Irish) saints, voyaged to Inishbofin, where he built him a church and died in 676.

As was to be expected under the circumstances, the monks of Iona continued steadfast in the old way. In time, however, Adamnan, the most erudite, and, next to the founder, most celebrated, of the abbots, either on his first visit, in 686, or, more probably, his second, two years later, to his friend, king Alfrid, made some stay in Northumbria. There he saw² the 'canonical rites', and, being earnestly exhorted by many, including Coelfrid, preceptor of Bede, whose monastery of Jarrow he went to see, not to live, with his exceedingly few in an extreme corner of the world, contrary to the custom of the universe in the matter of Paschal observance or any other decrees, was won over to the new system. On his return,³ he endeavoured to convert Iona and those Still, for eight¹ years, from 690, outward harmony prevailed. The abbot yielding to the opposition of the monks, Iona witnessed not the scandal of two Easters in one year. At length, however, they reached the parting of the ways. In 697, Adamnan had occasion to visit Ireland, where he seems to have remained until the year of his death. During this period, he gradually gained over by his persuasiveness nearly all who were not under the influence of Iona. Finally, not improbably in the abbey of Durrow, he kept Easter² on March 30, whilst the Columban communities were entering on the second and more rigid half of their Lent, preparatory to Easter on April 20, 704. Thus pledged, he returned, with what foreboding we can easily imagine, to his island home. But he was mercifully spared the humiliation³ of a more serious discord,—the abbot observing the following twelfth of April as Palm Sunday; the monks celebrating it as Easter Day. In the September after his return, he was called to his crown.

In conclusion, sufficient, though not exhaustive, confirmatory evidence that Init signifies (not Shrove-tide, as at 1014;³ in the Rolls' edition of the Tripartite,⁴ and elsewhere,⁵ but) Quadragesima Sunday, is given under A.D. 1109. The error arose from the constantly recurring cause,—proleptic attribution of latter-day meaning. The textual entry of that year forbids a higher date to any native document containing mention of Ash Wednesday. Such, for instance, is the Corpus Missal, which has a full ceremonial⁶ for that day. Tertia est luna in Initio Quadragesimæ, eo anno quo decima quinta luna est die Dominico Paschæ, et cætera similiter (Beda Op., Basil., 1563, II. 347; Colonia Agrip., 1612, II. 233; P. L. XC. 610).*

Two imperfect tenth-century

MSS. of the Victorian Cycle give day and moon of the Initium Quadragesimæ after the epact (M.G.H., SS. Antiqs. IX., 674, 685). Unfortunately, with one exception, these valuable data have been omitted by the editor. Victorian Cyclic No. 181 (A.D. 208) had, according to the Greeks, the Beginning of Lent on March 13, moon 10; Easter, April 24, m. 21 (ib. 703).

To judge from this, the inserted reckoning was Alexandrine. The Victorian Easter (XIII. B) was April 17, moon 16 (Tables U, V); Quadragesima Sunday, March 6, m. 3 (16—13); i.e. new moon, March 4 (Table W). Moon 10 of the MSS. should be m. 9 (21—12). The epact of the Alexandrine XIX. is 27, which has new moon on March 5; moon 9 on March 13 (Table W.)

It remains to discharge the pleasing duty of thanking the Council of the Royal Irish Academy, for uniform encouragement and consideration throughout the progress of the work ; Mr. E. W. B. Nicholson, Bodley's Librarian, who had the MS. B. daily sent to the Radcliffe, after the closing hour of the Bodleian ; Rev. Maxwell H. Close, who with characteristic liberality had the Munich Computus photographed ; the Lord Abbot and Community of Mount Melleray, for spontaneous and unrestricted loans from their valuable library ; Very Rev. Percy S. Barron, Sub-Prior and Librarian, Mount Melleray, whose accurate verifications and transcriptions were of material assistance ; and Mr. Alfred de Burgh, Assistant Librarian, Trinity College, Dublin, whose courtesy and firsthand acquaintance with books were equal to the most exigent demands.

APPENDIX A.

HIPPOLYTAN PASCHAL TABLES.

In addition to their importance as Paschal data, the Hippolytan Tables are the earliest proof hitherto brought to light of the knowledge of the Julian luni-solar year among the Romans. For convenience of reference, the Times, which were explained in the lost Exposition, have been printed separately. The text * has been taken from photographs.

* Instead of the firsthand work postulated in a publication of the kind, the Corpus Inscriptionum Graecarum merely subjoins the variants of various editors, without any attempt at discrimination (Vol. IV., Berlin, 1877, no. 8613, p. 283-4). The ferial numbers are ferial letters (Notantur autem feriae litteris, . . . ita quidem, ut littera . . . σ [significet diem] Veneris, p. 285); the two dates, still a crux (Qua vero causa factum sit, ut annis 3 et 11 cyclorum duplex mensis dies praefigeretur, quem ex feriae nota apposita alterum tantum intellegendum esse appareat, non satis liquet, ib.).

With reference to cessation from fasting when the 14th of the Paschal moon fell on Sunday, we learn from Eusebius (in the matter of Pope Victor and the Quartadecimans) that a question of no little importance was agitated between all the Asian dioceses and the rest of the church: the former, from ancient tradition, deeming they ought observe the 14th of the mo (whereon the Jews were enjoined to sacrifice the lamb) as the feast the Saviour's pasch, by breaking t fast, whatever day of the week should fall on ; the latter preserving the custom derived from apostolic tradition and operative then, that it was not meet to break the fast on any other except the day of the Resurrection (H. E. vi. 23)

stom derived from apos-tion and operative to t was not meet to break

rection (H. E. vi. 23).

This shows that the vast majority at the time fasted on the Sundays of Lent. Under the circumstances, the Hippolytan restriction of the Asiatic rule to Sunday was a compromise little calculated to secure acceptance for this cycle at Alexandria and Rome.

The events were calculated to have preceded the years at which they stand by exact multiples of 112. The various multiples were given in the (lost) Hippolytan Exposition of the Times. The alternative dates, according to Daniel, were taken from a (lost) explanation of the prophecy regarding the Seventy Weeks. Taking the Passovers in order of time, the D chronology, if the Table, which is exceedingly doubtful, be correct, differed from H in making the three first (Ex., Des., Josh.) 91 years earlier; the fourth (Ez.) and fifth (Jos.), respectively 30 and 27 later; the sixth (Esd.), 94 earlier.

As regards the two remaining events, no difficulty presents itself. Birth of Christ is demonstrably misplaced. A. D. 223 E, II. — (112 × 2) = B. C. 2 E, II. But the equivalence was likewise and chiefly intended to be luni-solar. Hence A. D. 222 F, I. — 224 = B. C. 3 F, I. The words consequently belong to this, the initial, year. The emendation is fully confirmed by Passion of Christ: 253 B, VIII. — 224 = 29 B, VIII.

NOTE

A Syriac tract on the Hippolytan Canon, published in Lagarde's Analecta Syriaca (Leipsic, 1858), a work not accessible to the Editor, has been more amply edited* in the Analecta Sacra (Vol. IV. Antenicensis Fathers, Paris, 1883) of the Solesmes Spicilegium by Abbé Martin. The information, supplied by the research of the Librarian of Mount Melleray, arrived opportunely while this sheet was passing through the press.

The Version and Notes relative to the provenance and cyclic technique are as follows. (The bracketted insertions, except [21], [olaf] and [solaris], are derived from the other Notes.)

* Text, p. 56-7; translation and notes, p. 324-5.

AD MENTEM SANCTI HIPPOLYTI, EPISCOPI.¹

I. Quando cognoscere volumus quota die Adar [Martii], aut Nisan [Aprilis], cadat dies XIV, juxta mentem Hippolyti, ordinamus annos ab Alexandro per octo et octo. Si supersit unum, XIV dies cadit in diem 13 Nisan, illiusque littera est *vav*⁶. Si duo supersint, dies XIV est 2 mensis Nisan, illiusque littera est beith. Si supersint tres, dies XIV cadit in 22 [21] mensis Adar, illiusque littera est dolath. Si quatuor supersint, dies XIV cadit in diem 9 mensis Nisan, illiusque littera est beith. Si supersint quinque, dies XIV cadit in diem 29 mensis Adar, illiusque littera est he. Si supersint sex, dies XIV cadit in diem 18 mensis Adar, illiusque littera est dolath [olaf]. Si supersint [p. 325] septem, dies XIV cadit in diem 5 mensis Nisan, illiusque littera est he. Si supersint octo, dies XIV cadit in diem 25 mensis Adar, illiusque littera est olaf.¹

II. Et quando scire volumus quota die hebdomadis cadat dies XIV, addimus² litteram diei XIV, anno æquali³ [scil. communi], litteræ funda-

ponantur, non deprehenduntur consentire cum laterculis an. 1551 repertis ad latum statuæ s. Hippolyti.

² Omnes litteræ præter valorem phoneticum habent etiam valorem numericum. Olaf=1; beith=2; gomal=3; dolath=4; he=5; vav=6; zain=7.

mentali anni, et, anno subacto [scil. bissextili], excedenti ejus, atque extrahimus e summa hebdomadem, si una existat : quod superest est feria diei XIV correspondens.

III. Composuit Hippolytus canonem in quo indicat quota die Adar, aut Nisan, et quota die hebdomadis adveniat quovis anno dies XIV. Porro, cum hoc utentes canone volumus scire diem XIV, dividimus annos ab Alexandro per xvi., et quod superest extrahimus ex linea xvi. annorum, et invenimus in hoc numero an sit, illo anno, mensis lunaris [solaris] subactus [scil. bissextilis], annon, et quo die, quo mense, sit dies XIV. Deinde redimus ad fundamentum⁵ hujus anni, et reperimus quo die hebdomadis cadat dies XIV hoc anno.

IV. Oportet autem scire illo computo requiri ut xvi. anni Syri efficiant xvi. annos lunares et sex menses. Porro a doctoribus scrutatus ille canon inventus est non esse justus, et proinde rejectus est. Sexdecim anni Syri efficiunt enim 5844 dies, dum xvi. anni et sex menses lunares continent circa 5847 dies. Tres igitur dies inter utrumque [computum] superesse reperiuntur. Porro si excedens illud computetur per decem cyclos, qui efficiunt 160 annos, triginta obtinentur dies : quod utique est gravis error. Propter hanc causam rejecerunt hunc canonem [doctores] ; et insuper, quia, juxta illum, dies paschalis, tempore quo confectus est, incidere poterat ante æquinoctium vernalis.

canonis Hippolytei, seu 2 quartae octaeteridis. Atqui si addas D seu 4, in prima octaeteride et D seu 4, quæ est littera fundamentalis quartæ octaeteridis, habes 8. Unde quum 7, seu hebdomadam, extraxeris, obtinebis 1 seu

A. Igitur, anno 248, dies XIV cadebat in feriam primam hebdomadæ.

⁵ Id est ad numerum ordinalem, non solum in hecaeteride, verum et in ipsarum hecaeteridum serie.

The cyclic explanations, candour compels the avowal, are still more erroneous than those in the Corpus Inscriptionum. (I.) As to the alleged correspondence of the Syriac letters with the Greek on the Hippolytan statue, suffice it that F, for an obvious reason, is not among the latter. So far from disagreeing, the calculations, as we shall see, are in perfect accord with the original. (II.) The statement that the letters here employed have a phonetic and numerical value needs no refutation. Worst of all is the assertion that the fundamental letters denote the consecutive octaeterids. The dictum is completely disproved by the example. A.D. 248 is the 27th (not 26th) of the Canon ; the 3rd (not 2nd) of the fourth octaeterid ; whilst it has the 14th of the moon (March 21) on Tuesday (not Sunday) !

In the light of what has been said in the present Introduction on solar and luni-solar reckonings, the calculations present no difficulty.

I. Remainders (written in full in the original) are the Hippolytan Golden Nos. (Tables D, E, F) ; Letters (Syriac alphabetical characters = nos.) are the ferials of a Paschal year beginning on April 1,* used partly in retrograde order (as directed in the Computus of Maximus†) = the G-column of Table C and the D.L. circuit of Diagram A, commencing with No. 25. Tabulated, the results are the following.

* Supra, p. xxiv.

† Part III. c. vi. Pet. III. 188.

The following is the synopsis of the calculations for the first octaeterid.

* P. xxiv, supra.

WEEK-DAY INCIDENCE OF HIPPOLYTAN MOON 14 (CALCULATED BY GOLDEN NO. FERIALS AND FUNDAMENTAL LETTERS (CONCURRENTS)).

a		b	c	d	e	f
A.D.		G.N.	Moon 14, Month-days of.	Ferials (Table Y) of c.	Fund. LL. (Concur.) of a.	Week-days of c = d + e.
222	F	I.	A 13	6	1	7 (Sat.)
223	E	II.	A 2	2	2	4 (Wed.)
224	D C	III.	M 21	4	4	(8-7 =) 1 (S.)
225	B	IV.	A 9	2	5	7 (Sat.)
226	A	V.	M 29	5	6	(11-7 =) 4 (W.)
227	G	VI.	M 18	1	7	(8-7 =) 1 (S.)
228	F E	VII.	A 5	5	2	7 (Sat.)
229	D	VIII.	M 25	1	3	4 (Wed.)

The factors are d and e. How d is found appears in I. The rule to find e was taken as well known. This was to reduce the given year to the Alexandrine A.M.; divide by 28: opposite the remainder in the first Maximian Rota is the Fundamental Letter (or Concurrent) in question. For example, A.D. 222 is Alexandrine A.M. 5714. Divided by 28, this leaves 2; which number in the Maximian Rota has 1 attached (i.e. the Concurrent of no. 26 of Diagram A). As March 24 has the same week-day incidence as March 31, here, at length, it may be, we have the origin of Concurrents. (Cf. p. xxix., supra.)

III. This section calls for no observation, except that it was manifestly composed by one who was unaware that the hecaeterid was made up of two octaeterids. It was thus very probably older than; certainly, written without cognisance of, I. and II.

IV. Divided by 2, the calculations here given agree with those set forth in the Introduction.* The section proves there was a third writer. Who would be at pains to draw up rules for a system that he had shown was erroneous and stated was rejected?

The dates would seem to have been posterior to the lapse of the Hippolytan 112 years. Had the computists lived before 333, rules to identify the given year in the Canon would have sufficed. This is confirmed by the objection of ante-equinoctial Paschal incidence,—an objection not likely to be made until the Anatolian or Alexandrine system prevailed. Furthermore, on the assumption that the Alexandrine A.M., on which e of Table Z is based, was originated by Panodorus,† the computistic sections (I., II., III.) of the tract cannot have been drawn up before the final decade of the fourth century.

De Bissexto.)

Annus plenus de bissextis in mille cecetislx. continetur. Bissexti totius libri Victorii c. xxx. iii. [sunt]. Ab initio mundi iii. anni de bissextis pleni sunt, usque in praesentem annum, sub consulibus Bero et Bardoa (fol. 23a, l. 8-12).

The (apparently Hibernian) full year = 1460 is 365×4 . Next, A.M. 5358 (A.D. 157)–4380 (1460×3) = 978,—a computation that does not err on the side of precision. The scribe, accordingly, not for the first time, blundered. The multiplier is iiii. The total is thus 5840; so that four years were full, with 50 over, in 5890, the A.M. of 689.

The Consuls, needless to add, are of 160 (Almeloveen, Fasti Cons. 139). As the author's original, the Victorian Cycle, has Vero, the question does not arise whether the name was Barus (op. cit. 222).

† The original is the first of the prose notanda appended to the Calendar in the Bedan Dubious & Spurious Didascalics. Comparison will sufficiently indicate the capacity of the scribe.

BEDAN CALENDAR JUNE

NOTANDUM.

Junius, a junioribus populi Romani appellatur: sive (ut Cyngius arbitratur) Junonius ante vocabatur a Junone: et post, detritis quibusdam litteris, Junius dictus est. Nam et aedes Junonis Monetæ calendis Junii dedicatæ sunt (Migne, P.L., XC. 772).

MUNICH COMPUTUS.

DE MENSE IUNIO.

Iunius aiuin[i]oribus [a iun-] gignus ait. Quod iunonius prius apud latinos vocatus est. Inde postea detritis aliis litteris iunius vocatur. Inedes [In edes] munitae iunonio deo Kl. iunii dedicate (fol. 14a, l. 4-8).

PASSAGES CONTAINING AN IRISH WORD.

The bilingual term, diei-Cetene, for Wednesday in the following excerpts (relative to the three immovable years of the world, in the Section De Mundo) proves that the Computus was composed by a native for native readers, most probably resident in Ireland.

Cetene is genitive singular of cét-ain (second e = ai), first-fast. Wednesday was called Dia-cétaine (Day of first-fast), or Cétain, to distinguish it from Friday, named Dia-haine (Day of [chief] fast), or Ain. In the Section De feriis (fol. 11b, l. 3-17), the planetary and ferial names of the week-days are given and explained. The only apparent reason, accordingly, that presents itself for the use of the native vocable here is that the similarity between (the oblique cases) Diei-Lunae and Dé-Luain, Diei-Martis and Dé-Mairt suggested Diei-Cetene as the equivalent of Dé-Cétaine, the third item of the Irish jingle.

Introduction of the vernacular is a feature of Hiberno-Latin amply authenticated otherwise. The origin of the Wednesday and Friday fasts is immaterial to the present purpose.

ADDENDA.

P. xxxiii., l. 3. (A.D. 222).—The inscription relied upon by Vignolius (Hippolyti Opera, ed. Fabricio, vol. I. Hamburgi, 1716, p. 157), to prove that Alexander was not emperor on April 13, 222, was manifestly fabricated after the discovery of the Hippolytan statue. (Cf. ib., p. 155.)

P. xxxvi., l. 13, salit in retro.—The expression occurs in the section de origine epactarum of the De argumentis lunae in the Bedan Dubious & Spurious Didascalics. In fine xix. anni habebis epactas xviii. Adde xi. super xviii., fiunt xxix. Addesaltum lunae, fiunt xxx. Hi[n]c apparet quod non addit, sed salit in retro, unum diem (P. L. XC. 724).

P. xl., l. 4, defect.—Blanchini's fantastic Dissertation (Hippolyti Opp., I. 93-136), with its twelve portentous Tables (ib. 137-40), embodying, inter alia, the lesser, greater and greatest Periods of 112, 784 and 3248 years (ib. 99), respectively, and the Nundinals, to prove the retrospective and prospective accuracy of the Hippolytan Canon, hardly deserved the paragraph of refutation given to it by Ideler (Handbuch, II. 223-4). Ex uno disce. According to the second rule (p. 107), I. 6 of the Table is to be followed by VII. 7 (p. clxiv.)!

P. xliv., l. 22.—See p. xxxiv., n. 2.

„ li., l. 7—Cf. Todd Lect. Ser. III. 347.

P. lxi., l. 20.—See p. xxv.-vi.

P. lxxiii., l. 1.—The 100-year List was known to Ussher (Brit. Ec. Antiq. c. xvii. Wks. vi. 497) in the edition of Bucherius (De doc. tem. 252-7).

„ l. 9.—After intended insert: A. D. 370 had Easter on the 14th of the moon, and is excluded accordingly.

P. lxxix., ll. 5-7.—For A. U. C. 461 (B. C. 293), Curgis (Gurges) and Scaevola (Scaeva) are given instead of Cursor and Maximus; the Consuls of 462 are omitted. Accordingly, from 461 to the beginning, the (proleptic) week-day names and the epacts of the Fasti are erroneous. By scribal oversight, the two series are left out A. U. C. 706—14 (B. C. 48—40), inclusive.

Partial and necessarily futile attempts to explain the first seven years were made by Petavius (De doc. tem. l. X. c. xx. Vol. II. 105-6) and Ussher (ubi sup., p. 495).

P. xc., n. 1.—Cf. p. cxlvi.

Clerice, diptycha lateri sit semper amica,

Nam sine diptycha non retinebis ea.

Si quem dura manet sententia iudicis olim,
 Damnatum ærumnis suppliciisque caput:
 Hunc neque fabrili lassent ergastula massa,
 Nec rigidas vexent fossa metalla manus;
 Lexica contexat: nam cetera quid moror? omnes
 Pœnarum facies hic labor unus habet.
